If it is so, as admitted, that the vast majority of these employees have their schedules limited to 10 hours or less, then it is all the more reason why a limit of time should be set in order to give all the employees the benefit of a limited 10-hour schedule. There should be some regard shown for the employees in arranging their tours of duty, and if a limit is placed by law that must be followed there is not a question of doubt in my mind but the postmasters will arrange the tours in such a way as to keep the men employed to the best possible advantage. A postmaster should be a man of executive ability, and if he possesses any of it at all he will see to it that his supervisory force arranges the work and schedules to get the best results. It shows to my mind that the employees are very liberal in their views when they are willing to have their 8 hours of service cover a period of 10 hours, and I believe it would show the proper spirit if the department officials would view things with a proper regard for the comfort and working conditions of the men.

SUNDAY WORK.

Until one year ago post-office clerks and letter carriers of this country were required to perform service on Sundays, for which they were not allowed either extra compensation or time off on one of the other six working days. Every possible effort was made to reduce Sunday service, and there being no law covering the subject each postmaster made such rules and regulations a he thought fit regarding the employment of these men on Sunday. The department stated many times that they were in favor of reducing Sunday service to the lowest possible minimum necessary to meet the proper requirements of the service, but as this was simply an expression of opinion or policy it was only followed in offices where the postmasters were really desirous and anxious to reduce Sunday service.

In the Post Office appropriation bill for the current fiscal year

In the Post Office appropriation bill for the current fiscal year provision was made to grant compensatory time on the working days to employees who are required to work on Sunday. The result has been that the great majority of the employees now enjoy one day of rest each week, but in order that all the employees should be granted this privilege the committee has recommended a provision which if enacted into law will give all the men the benefit of one day of rest in seven.

The Postmaster General, in closing his letter, states that—it is thought that the plan of giving the department authority to allow not exceeding 30 days' leave of absence with pay to clerks and carriers would prove not only less expensive than the legislation proposed, but more advantageous to the employees affected.

Mr. Speaker, if the expressions of opinion received by me in letters and personal interviews I have had with the employees since becoming a Member of this House express the sentiment of the men throughout the country, and I believe they do, then the Postmaster General has no idea of what the true sentiment of the employees really is. While it is true that these men would no doubt enjoy 30 days' leave of absence each year if a law was passed granting them this privilege, yet I am firmly convinced that they would much prefer the legislation recommended in this bill, that will insure their promotion to the highest grades when they have earned such promotion by length of service and efficiency and limiting their hours of labor to eight hours each day and giving them a day of rest each week. Surely this is not asking too much, and I believe if every Member of this House had the same opportunity to investigate the working conditions of the clerks and carriers of the post offices in this country they would join with the members of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee in placing the legislation recommended on the statute books.

GAG RULE.

The committee has recommended, with a few modifications, a bill introduced by Mr. LLOYD, of Missouri, which, to my mind, will correct an abuse that has been allowed to exist for too long a time. For the information of the Members of the House I will insert in the RECORD a copy of an Executive order covering the civil-service employees:

It is hereby ordered that no bureau, office, or division chief, or subordinate in any department of the Government, and no officer of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps stationed in Washington, shall apply to either House of Congress or to any committee of either House of Congress, or to any Member of Congress for legislation, or for appropriations, or for congressional action of any kind, except with the consent and knowledge of the head of the department; nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, except through or as authorized by the head of his department. (Executive order, Nov. 26, 1909.)

This rule, which is known by the employees as the "gag rule," has, as its name implies, effectually choked these employees and tied them hand and foot, and has prevented them from uttering any word of complaint even against the most outrageous treatment that could be heaped upon them. It has denied these employees the right of petition to Congress of their grievances unless their petition is presented through the head of the department under which they serve.

And by the way, that the Executive has experienced a change of heart, that he has realized that this is not a fair rule, is shown by the annulment of that rule to a certain extent within the past 48 hours.

It is a fact well known to many Members of this House that employees of the Government, through their associations in convention assembled, have discussed conditions of employment, hours of labor, and matters affecting the working and sanitary conditions surrounding their employment, and have passed resolutions which have been submitted year after year to Cabinet officers under whom they serve, but their grievances or petitions or resolutions were never submitted to Congress by these officials. Considering this condition of affairs, I believe it is high time that Congress should listen to the appeals of these men and provide a way whereby they can properly present a petition to the Members of Congress for a redress of grievances without the fear of losing their official positions.

The legislation recommended in this bill will insure to all the civil-service employees in the postal service the right to be furnished with a written copy of charges preferred against them, and will allow the employees a reasonable time to answer said charges in writing and to submit affidavits in support of their defense. It also requires that a full and complete record of each case shall be filed in the proper department or office, and copies shall be annually reported to Congress, and if the employee desires a complete record of his case it should be furnished him on request. The bill also provides that a copy be furnished to the Civil Service Commission on request of that body. This will give assurance and confidence to the employees that they will at least get a square deal, and will not permit of officers filing charges of one kind against an employee and having him removed from the service or reduced in salary on evidence submitted by the officer on matters entirely foreign to the original charges that the employee has answered in writing. Men in official positions will hesitate to trump up charges

Men in official positions will hesitate to trump up charges against an employee for the purpose of satisfying some personal animus or a political grudge, as all the cases of removals and reductions will be submitted to Congress each year, and the Members of this body can get a copy of all the papers in any case, and will be relieved of the necessity of losing much valuable time in calling at the department in person on matters affecting the interest of one of the employees in whom they are interested. It will also nullify the provisions of the Executive order which I referred to in the beginning of my remarks on this subject, and will permit associations of employees in the postal service to present their grievances to the Congress or any Member thereof without danger of the employees losing their positions or being reduced in grade or compensation.

I know that some Members of this House will say that this

I know that some Members of this House will say that this might possibly open a way to indiscreet men to present their personal or imaginary grievances to Members of Congress, but if this is so such employees would have to assume the responsibility for their acts in the event of making false or misleading charges that could not be borne out by evidence on investigation. Above all, it would insure the right of petition to those employees whose rights have been taken away from them by this Executive order, and I believe it is the duty of Congress, when flagrant injustice is brought to its attention, to provide a

This legislation will assure the employees that their proper appeals for a redress of grievances will receive the attention they deserve and will allow the representatives of the employees to appear before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads or other committees of this House to present their side of the case on pending matters affecting the interest of the employees.

Under the present order of things the committee only gets one side of a case unless the members of the committee assume to themselves the responsibility of making a personal investigation or personal inquiry among the employees of their acquaintance. I believe it is well to have as much publicity as possible on public matters, and further believe that it is absolutely wrong and manifestly unfair and unjust to place the welfare of thousands of our citizens in the hands and at the mercy of the whims of any single individual, whether he be a Cabinet officer or anyone else. The employees in the postal service are, as a rule, men of high ideals and of good standing in their respective communities, and any law or rule that has for its object the curtailment of their rights will meet with just resentment. us lift this ban from around the necks of these men and take the gag from out their mouths and give them the assurance that the fact of their accepting a position in the Government service will not disbar them from presenting their proper petitions to

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. What modification has been made of the gag rule by the recent order of the President?

Mr. REILLY. Practically none. It simply provides that an employee may petition Congress, but it must be done through the head of the department. He can have no direct communication with Congress or with any Member thereof.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And heretofore— Mr. REILLY. Even that was prevented.

Mr. REILLY. Even that was prevented.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Heretofore no petition made to the head of a department had ever been presented to Congress.

Mr. REILLY. Not so far as anyone knows; and it can be readily seen what standing an employee of the department would have thereafter if he complained of the conduct of a certain official or of the head of his department through the head of that department.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman speaks of carriers getting vacations and having to work the route of another Has not that resulted in a poor service to the public?

Mr. REILLY. I do not think there is any question about the service deteriorating under that plan, because of putting double work upon a man in the heat of summer, when it is harder to perform.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And making him serve a route with which he is not familiar.

Mr. REILLY. With which he is entirely unfamiliar, or almost wholly so.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Did the gentleman, as a member of the committee or as a Member of the House, receive complaints as to a spy system among the clerks also?

Mr. REILLY. I received one or two complaints of that sort, but they were not nearly so plain or so positive as those in regard to the carriers.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Is it not a fact that in the post offices of the country men who are employed by the Government as clerks are given collateral employment without compensation by postmasters and other supervising officials to spy upon their fellows in the service?

Mr. REILLY. I have heard such a story, but I would not pretend to say that it was true.

UNFAIR TREATMENT.

For several years past the President has issued an order each year declaring for a Saturday half holiday during the summer months. This order affects all Government employees in the departments and in the Government Printing Office and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but, strange to say, it does not include the letter carriers and clerks in post offices

In nearly all cities the postmasters and local officials take advantage of this order and take a well-earned rest after their weeks' work, and are better fitted to resume their duties on Monday morning. I stated a moment ago that the post-office clerks and letter carriers do not get the benefit of this Saturday half holiday. Yes; I repeat that they do not get the benefit of the order, and I further declare that during the heated term, at a season of the year when the President feels that the best interest of the service is conserved by granting the employees a half holiday, these clerks and carriers are required to do more work than is expected of them at other periods.

SPYING SYSTEM.

I have been asked if I could not do something to stamp out the spy system. It seems that in some post offices there are men designated as "gum-shoe men," who go out and follow the carriers around on their districts and spy on them from doorways and behind tree boxes and wagons and other obstacles and note from a distance every little act of the carrier, whether he walks slowly or stops to answer a question of a citizen or to answer questions of householders, and the report of these spies is used as the basis of charges preferred against these men.

Sometimes the "gum-shoe man" is sent out with the carrier in order to test the district and find out if the carrier is doing his full duty in the shortest space of time. These men, unhampered and with nothing heavier in their possession than a watch which they generally hold in their hands, set a pace for the carrier and start to hotfoot it over the district. If the carrier can not keep up with the pace set for him, he is reported as delinquent and not doing all the work that the "spotter" thinks he should do. I do not believe that the people of this country are in favor of any such system as this, and if these conditions are true, I believe that it is well for Congress to be familiar with them, and there is no way that we can get this information unless we pass a law that will permit the employees to submit to their Member of Congress a statement of the conditions under which they work when these conditions become obnoxious.

COUNTING CARRIERS' STEPS.

Some communications received by me contain information that is news to me. One letter contained a copy of an order issued by the superintendent of the Brooklyn post office, which reads as follows:

On Tuesday, February 20, 1912, each carrier of the general post office will make an accurate account of the exact number of steps taken by him during the day while engaged in serving route or collecting. When submitting count at the end of each tour, each carrier will note on his slip the exact length in inches from heel to heel of an ordinary step taken by him.

In this same letter came a newspaper clipping from the Brooklyn Standard Union, which stated that 65 pounds of mail was the average amount taken out by letter carriers, and that this information had been gathered by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, on a recent visit to that city. It was learned by the committee that the order I have read was actually issued by the superintendent and that it was expected that the carriers would obey it and furnish the information requested. I would like the Members of this House to try and draw on their imagination long enough to picture a letter carrier with 65 pounds of mail on his back, composed of letters, packages, newspapers, and magazines, trying to keep his mind on his work and at the same time count and measure every step he took from the time he left the post office until he returned. I have been informed that there are more than 1,000 letter carriers in the Brooklyn post office, and that when this order was issued that some of the men, in going over their routes and trying to obey it, were accused by the public of being intoxicated, and many of the public who had learned to respect their letter carrier, were so horrified at the conduct of the men that they actually believed that they were losing their minds, and this gag law would not permit of the presentation of these facts to the Members of this House by these employees. I would much prefer if some member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department would explain to the House the conditions that they found in that office on their recent visit. [Applause.]

I want to say to you gentlemen that the condition I have described as applied to the letter carriers applies equally if not with greater force to the post-office clerks. I believe the charge that is being made by the department in opposition to this legislative feature of the bill, namely, this eight-hour provision, that it will be the cause of men delaying their route and thereby getting overtime, is not worthy of consideration. I believe that it is an insult to the honesty and integrity of these men, who are among the most faithful employees of this Government, and I believe further that any executive order issued by an understrapper, or by the Postmaster General himself, who will state that as a reason for opposing this eight-hour bill men will be induced to loaf to get overtime, is not worthy of that position and is not worthy of the confidence of the Members of this

House in anything he says. [Applause.]

These features of this bill, I believe, are humane in every respect. I believe that this eight-hour bill can be enforced without the expenditure of one additional dollar, because during the seven years when the department was made to have the eight-hour law lived up to it was done. These routes can be arranged, these terms of service of the post-office clerks can be so arranged, that the work can be done within the eight hours; and if overtime is necessary, I believe it is entirely a fair proposition that the clerks and carriers should be paid pro rata.

In England when overtime is performed the clerk or carrier is paid one and one-quarter or one and one-half time. In regard to the Sunday service, a man has been allowed compensatory time of 10 minutes to-day and 10 minutes to-morrow scattered through the week, and it does him no good whatever. This bill provides that when a man performs one or two hours' duty on Sunday he shall have the same length of time given in the following week day.

AS TO CLERKS.

Clerks in post offices of the first and second class have never been protected in any way by any legislation to limit their hours of labor. As a consequence, they have been compelled to work any number of hours that the whim or caprice of their superiors might see fit to exact.

In view of the accepted policy of this Government that not more than eight hours of labor in each day shall be demanded of its employees, it is impossible to justify the discrimination that excepts this worthy class of employees from the operation of this beneficent policy.

On June 30, 1911, there were 32,319 clerks employed in the 2,351 first and second class post offices of the United States.

The hours of labor and the working conditions of such a vast army of public employees can only be properly and safely regulated by statutory legislation.

It stands to reason that where the power of interpretation as to what constitutes a day's labor for these employees is vested in 2,351 individual postmasters, discrimination, favoritism, and chaos is bound to prevail. These postmasters, it must be borne in mind, constitute a shifting force, constantly coming and going. The condition as to their hours of labor has been so burdensome that for years these clerks have been appealing to Congress to enact legislation for their relief. Such legislation is their greatest need.

In 230 first and second class post offices, located in practically every State of the Union, the clerks report that for the month of October, 1911, they were actually on duty for a daily average of from 8 hours and 30 minutes to 12 hours. Because these clerks work behind the four walls of a post office, not much is known of the nature of their duties. Their work is exacting, both body and mind being constantly employed. A very large percentage is employed at night, working under artificial light and very often in poorly ventilated and crowded quarters. Besides the time the clerk is actually on duty at the post office, a large percentage of them are required to devote hours of study on their own time to master the difficult "schemes" of mail on their own time to master the difficult "schemes" of mail distribution, that they may rapidly and correctly distribute and dispatch the mail for every State in the Union. For these extra hours of study they receive no consideration whatever.

This proposed legislation provides that these clerks, as well as the letter carriers, shall be compelled to work not more than 8 hours a day, provided that the 8 hours shall be worked within a paried of 10 consecutive hours.

within a period of 10 consecutive hours.

There is an excellent reason for the proviso. Under existing conditions in the service, even where an eight-hour schedule may be in force, the eight hours is often spread out over a day of 12 hours and even more. This means that the clerk is compelled to report for duty three or more times a day. He is compelled to register off duty from two to four hours at a time. This time off duty is so broken up that it can not be put to any practical use by the clerk. He either remains within the post-office building or if his home is in the immediate vicinity he may go there for an hour or so.

The necessity for being within call of the office imposes a direct financial loss, because the employee is prohibited by the circumstances of his employment from living at a distance from the office where the rents are cheaper or where he might even hope to acquire a home. This system of compelling the employees to register off duty at different times of the day is peculiar to the postal service and it may safely be said that no such system would be tolerated by a private employer.

In opposition to the enactment of this legislation it is contended that because of a supposed variation in the volume of the mails at different seasons of the year, it is impracticable to work the clerks on a daily schedule of eight hours, the eight hours to be worked within a period of 10 consecutive hours. That to establish an eight-hour day would mean that more clerks than are necessary would have to be employed during certain periods in order to have on hand a sufficient force to work the mails when the volume might be greater. That the provision of this proposed legislation which provides that the employees affected shall be paid extra for all time worked in excess of eight hours would be a temptation to the employees to purposely extend their labors beyond the eight-hour period to increase their compensation. That the proposed legislation might prove costly and wasteful.

VOLUME OF MAIL.

In the first place, there is not such a great change in the volume of mail matter as might be supposed. Following is a table showing the total postal receipts by months for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, for the 50 largest post offices in the country:

July	$7, 453, 818, 60
August	8, 492, 885, 26
September	9, 900, 181, 93
October	9, 696, 970, 57
November	9, 956, 475. 20
December	11, 528, 332, 63
January	9, 620, 564, 06
February	9, 339, 037, 50
March	11, 175, 486, 00
ADTII	9, 714, 929, 68
May	9, 238, 842, 86
June	9, 315, 525. 29

_____ 115, 433, 049, 58

The receipts from these 50 largest offices represent 48.52 per cent of the total receipts of the entire postal service.

There is, of course, a very close relationship between the postal revenues and the volume of mail matter.

A study of the postal revenues by months indicates that there is comparatively little change in the amount of monthly res comparatively inthe change in the amount of monthly receipts for eight months of the year, namely, September, October, November, January, February, April, May, and June, the average for these eight months being $9,597,815.88. The receipts for November were $9,956,475.20. This indicates remarkable uniformity in the volume of mail for eight months of the year.

The receipts for August are approximately $1,000,000 less than this average for the eight months quoted, and the receipts for July are approximately $2,000,000 less.

These are the two abnormally light months of the year in midsummer and it is at this time that the clerks take their annual vacations of 15 days. The department has contended that during these summer months the clerks do not work as much as 8 hours a day and consequently are compensated for the days in winter when they are obliged to work 9 and 10 hours.

As a matter of fact the clerks never average less than eight hours a day because of the large number who take their vacations in the summer months, the clerks remaining on duty being compelled to take care of the work of the clerks who are on leave.

For the next fiscal year the department asked for $175,000 to compensate substitutes who might act for clerks on vacation leave, this sum being $50,000 more than the amount appropriated for the current year.

On page 76 of the hearings on the Post Office appropriation bill we find the following statement by the First Assistant Postmaster General bearing on the subject:

Postmaster General bearing on the subject:

Mr. Grandfeld. Yes, sir. The law now provides for 15 days' leave of absence with pay, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, to clerks in post offices after one year's service. The appropriation heretofore made has enabled the department to allow substitutes for only about 10 per cent of the clerks. There has been no increase in the appropriation for several years and we have more or less trouble in providing a sufficient force of substitutes to take the place of clerks on leave, and for that reason we have asked for a considerable increase.

Mr. Finley. The clerks who remain on duty complain in some instances that they have been required to do overwork.

Mr. Grandfeld. Yes, sir; that has some bearing on it, too, but heretofore we have appointed most of the additional clerks on the 1st of July and utilized the services of the additional men during July and August in taking the places of the regular employees absent on leave. Last year, I think, we appointed more on October 1 than on July 1, because on October 1 the business in the post offices, as a rule, begins to increase materially.

This statement that the department does not furnish substi-

This statement that the department does not furnish substitute or auxiliary help for more than 10 per cent of the clerks on vacation makes it self-evident that the extra work thrown upon the clerks remaining on duty renders less than an eight-hour schedule in the summer impossible.

Reliable statistics gathered from the clerks themselves indicate very plainly that the clerks, and particularly those employed in the smaller first-class offices and those employed in second-class offices, are very frequently compelled to work from one-half to three hours in excess of eight hours per day in order that the work may be kept up during the vacation period. This condition of affairs robs the clerks of all opportunity for summer relaxation. The postal receipts for December and March are approximately $2,000,000 above the average of the normal eight months of the year.

The receipts for these two months indicate an abnormal volume of mail. One of several ways to meet the emergencies of these two months, or any other period of emergency that may possibly arise, is provided for in this proposed legislation in the following quoted paragraph:

That in cases of emergency, or if the needs of the service require, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices can be required to work in excess of eight hours a day, and for such additional services they shall be paid extra in proportion to their salaries as fixed by law.

In connection with this paragraph it is essential to bear in mind that no legislation to limit the hours of labor can be legal and valid unless some penalty clause is included which will provide that extra pay must be paid for all services in excess of the eight hours.

The Supreme Court has held that the general eight-hour law of 1868, which applies to Government laborers, mechanics, etc., is merely directory and not mandatory, because it did not provide for any penalty in the event that the employee worked in excess of eight hours. Even this act does not cover clerks.

It hardly seems worth while to argue further against the

It hardly seems worth while to argue further against the absurd and groundless contention that under the operation of the law in this paragraph that the employees would purposely extend their tours of duty beyond eight hours for the sake of increasing their compensation. The men in the service want an eight-hour day. They are as loyal to the service as their superiors, and would scorn to take any such advantage of the law even if they were permitted to do so.

The department has at its command now an excellent remedy to apply to all emergencies of the service. The salary-classification act of March 2, 1907, providing for the classification and promotion of letter carriers and clerks employed in first and second class offices contains the following section:

That after June 30, 1907, auxiliary employees may be employed to be paid for actual service at the rate of 30 cents an hour: Provided, That such employees shall be required to work not less than two hours daily, and may serve as substitutes: And provided further, That such employees shall be eligible for appointment as clerks and carriers of the first grade.

This section was drawn by the department and, with the intention of providing a means with which to meet all periods of emergency by the employment of temporary help at the rate of 30 cents an hour.

Thus we see that the department itself has provided a way to prevent any overmanning of the service at any period of the year.

Suppose it should be necessary to employ the experienced clerks in excess of eight hours at such times as during the holiday period. The means is here provided. No attempt is here made to compel the Government to pay for this extra service at the rate of time and a half or time and a quarter. It is simply provided that the employee be paid exactly the same for time worked in excess of eight hours as he is paid for time within the eight hours.

If the theory of extra pay for time worked in excess of eight hours a day needs justification in the eyes of anyone it is to be found in the intention of the existing salary law of March 2, 1907, which contemplated meeting emergency periods by the employment of auxiliary help at the rate of 30 cents an hour. The average annual salary of the letter carrier is now $1,084, and the average annual salary of the post-office clerk is $1,082. On the basis of an eight-hour day the hourly compensation of these employees amounts to 36 cents.

Surely, then, if the services of a comparatively inexperienced "auxiliary" or "substitute" employee is conceded to be worth 30 cents an hour the service will surely be the gainer if during the holiday rush regular and experienced employees are at the command of the department at the average rate of 36 cents an hour.

If precedent were needed to justify the theory of extra pay for extra duty, it can be found in the English postal service. In the English service it is provided that time and a quarter be paid for all extra duty on week days. In the English service it is provided that all work on Sundays, Christmas Day, and on Good Friday be compensated for at the rate of time and one-half. For the purpose of recording all such extra duty the English service furnishes a stock form known as "extra-duty claim form." In the English system eight hours is a day's work and seven hours is a night's work.

That the department is not really opposed to extra pay for extra service in periods of emergency is indicated in the following statement of the First Assistant Postmaster General, which appears on page 113 of the hearings on the Post Office appropriation bill for 1913:

Mr. Grandfield. Yes, sir. I have examined only a few reports and I do not know to what extent the men were required to work overtime. However, I think it is a wise provision of law to permit this overtime at that particular season of the year.

This statement was made with reference to a clause concerning overtime for letter carriers which was incorporated in the current appropriation bill and which reads as follows:

That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay letter carriers who are required or permitted to work for more than 48 hours in the six working days of a week: Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to service performed during the first 5 and the last 15 days of the calendar year.

It must also be borne in mind that whenever a clerk is absent for any cause for a fraction of a day his pay is reduced on the basis of his hourly earnings.

However, there is really little to fear in regard to extra time for the employees. If the Congress establishes an eight-hour bill for post-office clerks, the department at Washington will have thrust upon it an incentive which does not now exist, to see that its army of supervisory officers throughout the country will so arrange the schedules of the employees that the 8 hours of work may be completed within a period of 10 hours. Experience has demonstrated that without such an incentive the department does not insist upon an intelligent arrangement of schedules.

HANDLING THE MAIL.

Another matter of importance in considering the practicability of an 8-hour day is the difference in the classes of mail matter. First-class matter, which is the great revenue-producing class of mail, does not by any means constitute the maximum proportion of all mail matter. Under existing conditions an effort is usually made to give the same service to the mail matter of second, third, and fourth class that is now given to first class. With the possible exception of daily and weekly papers and market reports, there seems to be no good reason why the same service should be given to the classes of mail matter which do not produce the same revenue. With the existence of an 8-hour schedule the force could be constantly employed for a period of 8 hours within 10 hours by giving first attention to first-class matter and, if there be periods of temporary lull, then attention could be devoted to the working of mail matter other than first class. The final argument made against this proposed legislation—that it might be costly—is entirely disproved by the following statement of the First Assistant Postmaster General, which appears on page 79 of the hearings on the Post Office appropriation bill for 1913:

Mr. GRANDFIELD. * * * About 85 per cent of the carriers and clerks complete their tour of duty within 10 hours, and probably 95 per cent within 11 hours, but in some instances their 8-hour tours of duty extend over 12 or 13 hours, I presume.

Then, if 85 per cent of the clerks and carriers complete their tour of duty within 10 hours, as this proposed legislation provides, it is most unjust not to extend the same working conditions to the remaining 15 per cent. Manifestly, if the principle of an 8-hour day in 10 hours is found to be practical for 85 per cent of the force, it is equally practical for all the force and can be extended to all the force without additional cost.

The public, the great patron of the mails, has much at stake in this proposed legislation. The public demands expedition in the handling of the mails.

The commerce and trade of our country is dependent upon an efficient and expeditious mail service.

There is no economy in failing to employ a sufficient force of clerks so that the mail can be handled quickly.

Where clerks are compelled to work in excess of eight hours it is patent that the force is not large enough and that some important mail matter is being delayed. That 8 hours should be worked within a period of 10 hours is at once reasonable and fair both to the service and to the employee.

COMPENSATORY TIME.

Another important paragraph of this proposed legislation is that which provides for the granting of compensatory time off duty for all work performed on Sundays by letter carriers and post-office clerks and which reads as follows:

That should the needs of the service require the employment on Sunday of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices, the employees who are required and ordered to perform Sunday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the six days following the Sunday on which they perform such service.

This provision has so much of merit in it that it needs no defense. The American people believe that every person should have one day of rest in seven, and preferably that day should be on Sunday. However, there are unique conditions prevailing in the postal service which demand that some labor be performed on Sunday.

That hereafter for services required on Sundays of supervisory officers, clerks in first and second class post offices, and city letter carriers, compensatory time off during working days in amount equal to that of the Sunday employment may be allowed, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, but this provision shall not apply to auxiliary or substitute employees.

This legislation was construed by the department to be permissive rather than mandatory, and the result is that in approximately 300 post offices of the first and second class the clerks have never received any compensatory time on week days for their Sunday labor.

There is no doubt that Congress intended this legislation to apply equally and fairly to all of the employees affected.

However, it seems to have been just loose enough in its wording to permit of misinterpretation. Many postmasters have so arranged the schedules of their employees that compensatory time for Sunday work is allowed in daily installments running as low as 10 minutes. Compenatory time allotted in this fashion is of no use to the employee whatsoever. Such an arrangement is but a manipulation of schedules to defeat the purpose of the legislation, which, no doubt, contemplated that if a clerk worked a full day on Sunday he should have a full day off on a week day

I hope the House will pass the provisions of this bill to which I have referred, as well as others to which I have had no time for reference. They are humane measures, and businesslike as well. They will be creditable to all who have part in making them laws and will be of vast benefit to a large class of faithful and efficient employees of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour, or such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very exhilarating situation in which I find myself. I do not wonder that it is so, for the bill that is pending affects every house in the United States and every person who lives in a house, and it is because of this, I assume, that all the Members are in their seats listening to what is being said on the pending question. [Applause.] I should be delighted if some one better qualified than I to speak on this subject of such vital importance to the American people were selected when every Member is so interested. do not believe that I am quite equal to the occasion. I fear that I am not. The post-office service is the greatest service of the Government. It expends a larger sum of money than any other service in the United States. It reaches more people than all the other services combined, and I do not wonder, in view of these facts, that every Member finds himself absorbed with interest in the discussion of the bill.

I realize that at a time like this it is only because of the vast interest they have in the discussion of this question that Members can keep themselves away from building up political fences or preventing them from being torn down. These are strenuous days. We are making Presidents, appointing and electing delegates all over the United States, either to select the Speaker of the House for the presidency, or some other man who is not yet in the public mind. We can not tell. To see the membership of the House so intense in their interests in the discussion of a great question like this, in the face of these politically strenuous times, speaks well for the patriotism of the membership in serving the people of the United States through the great postal service. [Applause.]

I wish I had the eloquence necessary to speak of the conditions affected by the postal service that the importance of the question justifies, but I have not, and I shall not attempt to place any flowery words in what I have to say. I shall attempt to call the attention of those Members who are present to the fact that one of the things in this bill which ought to receive more attention than it did receive from the committee is the compensation which should be paid to the men who do the lowest character of service in the Post Office Department, namely, the laborers. Every other class of servants in the post office service has had something done for them, while these men were ignored. I hope that when the bill is under consideration under the five-minute rule something will be done to increase the pay of these men. There is no chance for them to move up the ladder, because they are not subject to promotion in the classified service as the clerks and carriers are. They are not automatically promoted according to their length of service, but the work they do is not only strenuous but important, and some consideration ought to be given to them.

One of the things about which I desire to talk a little is the proposed legislation on parcel post. This bill provides for the reduction of the rate from 16 to 12 cents a pound, and the increase of the weight of the package from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, to enable the domestic package to be shipped from one point of the continent to the other on an equal basis with the packages that may be shipped from foreign countries under the International Postal Union Convention agreement.

The bill also provides that there shall be a so-called rural parcel post under which parcels up to 11 pounds may originate at the post office sending out the rural carriers into the rural districts, and the bill provides also that each of these rural carriers may take packages at intermediate points and deliver them to the destination at either end of his route. knows that this rural parcel-post proposition is not intended to give the service to the people which they are demanding. There is an attempt being made in the recommendation by this committee to satisfy the local village merchant who is opposed to the introduction of a parcel post and at the same time to satisfy the farmer who is in favor of a parcel post. The hope is that each one of these people will be so badly fooled that each will think he is getting what he wants, and at the same time that neither will get what he wants.

Personally I feel this way about the introduction of a parcel post. I think the Government of the United States is perfectly justified in using the post office as an instrumentality to distribute educational matter, such as letters, papers, books and magazines, and all things that will help to educate the people, but when it enters into the freight business and uses the Post Office Department to run a freight business, then I have some doubts about how it should enter upon the enterprise or whether it should enter upon it at all. Everybody must realize that if we enter upon the distribution of parcels to the people of the United States without first scientifically ascertaining just what we are going to do, how and what revenue we are going to receive, and how much it is going to cost to do the work, that we are not doing our whole duty not only to ourselves, but to the people.

I realize that there is an insistent demand on the part of the people, or a large part of them, for the establishment of a parcel post, and I realize also that there is an insistent demand on the part of an almost equally large number of the people that we shall not enter upon the enterprise. So it is an em-barrassing situation in which we find ourselves. We find that if we are for the proposition we are opposed by those who are against it, and if we are against the proposition we are opposed by those who are for it. But we have a duty to perform as Members of the Congress of the United States. It is our duty to study the question, to ascertain just what should be done, and we ought not to inaugurate a new system until we have scientific knowledge sufficient to warrant us in judging just what the outcome will be.

If we establish the parcel post unlimited, we begin to realize at once that we must establish freight depots in every city in the United States in order to take care of the freight that will be handed to the post office for distribution. The establishment of these freight depots will cost a vast amount of money; no-body knows how much. The cost of distributing these freight packages will be large; nobody knows how large. The cost of transportation of packages from New York to San Francisco will be just the same to the person who hands the package to the Government for transportation as it will be from New York to Yonkers. Everybody knows that you can not carry a package from New York to San Francisco for the same price that you can carry it from New York to Yonkers. The price fixed on the package, according to this bill, is 12 cents a pound, and the number of pounds that you can carry is limited to 11 in any one package. Twelve times 11 is 132. If you want to send a package of 11 pounds in weight from New York to Albany through the post-office service under this bill you will pay to the Government of the United States $1.32.

Everybody knows that the Government of the United States is not going to get the opportunity to carry that package, because the express companies of the United States will carry the package from New York to Albany for less than 25 cents, or not more than 25 cents at any rate. So that under the provisions of this bill the Government of the United States will be called upon to carry every package for long-distance travel and the express companies will carry the packages for the short distances

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.
Mr. LEWIS. I do not wish to intrude-

Mr. MADDEN. I will be delighted. I am not as well informed on the matter as the gentleman, and I do not want him to take advantage of my innocence or ignorance.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman has just made a statement which sounds perfectly rational, and on a priori reasoning ought to be true, but in my judgment it does not happen to be true because of the anomalous circumstances surrounding the express company. The express company, on a 10-pound package from here to Baltimore, upon which it receives a rate of 25 cents, will get about 13 cents. On the long haul from here to

San Francisco on a like package for which it would charge about $1.50 the express company would get 80 cents after paying the railroad for the haul. The services performed by the express companies in these instances would be practically identical as distinguished from the railway companies. The last thing the express company can afford to surrender under its peculiar situation is the long-haul traffic.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I am very glad, indeed, to have the statement of the gentleman, who has made a very thorough study of this subject, and I am sure he knows more about it than I do, but I am stating the proposition from the viewpoint as I see it, without having made a very exhaustive study of it. I am stating it from the viewpoint of a man who can not see how you can do a service over 3,000 miles distance at the same price you can do it over 150 miles distance, and I have never been able to understand how the Government of the United States could get the short haul at $1.32, on the 11-pound package, when the express company can deliver that package to its destination at 150 miles distance from a starting point at 25

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that magazines and papers going at the pound rate are carried by the express company as long as they can carry at a profit, and the moment they can not carry at a profit then they unload on the Government, where it is carried at a loss? And if the gentleman's statement is correct, why do not the express companies carry 1,000 miles, from New York to St. Louis, or clear across the continent, or clear to the Philippines, if, according to the logic of the gentleman, Mr. Lewis, whatever the fact may be, they would make more out of the long haul than the short haul, and they would not give it up?

Did the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. CANNON. I asked the gentleman a question about the gentleman's answer.

Mr. LEWIS. There is not any question, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois, that the profitable hauls the express companies have are the long hauls.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is, I may say with reference to the question of my colleague, that the express company carries magazines and newspapers to a point 700 miles or more from the place where they originate, and beyond that distance the post office carries them; so that if that be true, then the statement made by the gentleman from Maryland is not borne out by the facts. If the longer the distance they are carried by the express company the greater the earnings or the greater the profits, there is no reason then why, if his statement be a statement of scientific fact, the express company should not continue to carry from one end of the continent to the other, instead of limiting the territory over which they will carry at a given price.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman, I am sure, will pardon the further statement in order to clear up the situation. The express company in this country, on the average, receives 521 per cent of the rate charged. The services performed by it do not increase in expensiveness with the length of the haul. It performs nearly as much service in the matter of expensiveness in the short haul as it does on the average long haul, and yet it receives the identical proportion of the rate in each case. the long haul it gets about half the rate, and on the short haul it only gets half the rate.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I can not understand why the express company can afford to divide the revenue with the railroad company when you also said that the railroad company and the express company are identical so far as the stockholders and a division of the profits are concerned. The men who own the railroads generally own the express companies, and while the express companies per se can not get more than 50 per cent of the revenue received, yet the men who are interested in the express companies get the other 50 per cent, so that they get it all between them.

Mr. PROUTY. I wish to make a suggestion rather than to ask a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman. Mr. PROUTY. I wish to make a suggestion concerning the statement made here by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. Is not his logic faulty in this respect, that while express companies would be glad to hang on to the long haul, they can not control that? Is it not true that the man who does the shipping will be the man who determines by which route he will ship, whether by the mail service or by the express service, and that he will use the mail service when he can use it at cheaper rates than the express, and use the express when he can send it in that way at the lowest price?

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly the economics of the situation vill compel the man who ships the package to ship it by the cheapest route.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir. Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] made a statement on the profits which they receive on a package from Baltimore to Washington and on a package shipped across the continent, but the percentage of profit is as great on the short distance as on the long distance, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. The percentage is as great, but the amount is not as large.

Mr. LOBECK. But they will have more business between Baltimore and Washington than they would on the long haul?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. And the express company will take the aggregate of the business. The idea of the parcel post, which gives the American citizen the same rate as the foreigner can ship at now, is not going to accomplish anything for the American people. No man will ship an 11-pound package, at $1.32, through the post office if he can ship that package by the express service for half that amount, and everybody will concede that you can ship the 11-pound package for less than $1.32 for a distance of 700 or 800 miles or a thousand miles. So that when an American citizen sends an 11-pound package through the mails he is going to be certain that he sends it to a point where the postage charge is less than the express charge would be, if such a condition exists.

Now, I grant you that the provisions of this bill might, and probably would, increase the number of packages sent through the post office up to 4 or 5 pounds, but when you get beyond 5 pounds there will be no increase in the number of packages sent through the postal service, because the 5-pound package costs 60 cents, whether he sends it 1 mile or 3,000 miles.

And you can send a 5-pound package by express, I take it, to any point on the American Continent for less than 60 cents. A 4-pound package sent to any point in the United States would cost 48 cents. The chances are that the express charges in a case like that would be 50 cents. And so the citizen would have a 2-cent advantage by shipping the 4-pound package through the So while we pretend in this bill to establish a parcel post giving permission to the American people to use the mails for the distribution of packages, we are handing them a confidence game. I am not in favor of establishing any kind of a parcel post, or undertaking any other kind of business to be done by the Government of the United States, until we can do that thing with an intelligence that will enable us to see the outcome of the undertaking. There is no business man anywhere on the civilized globe that would establish a new branch of an already established business without ascertaining, first, what it would cost to put it into effect; second, what the business outcome of putting it into effect would be; third, how much money would be required to establish the facilities to enable it to transact the business in which he was about to For you must remember that if the Government of the United States undertakes to distribute freight, the people to whom this freight will be distributed will expect good and prompt service. They will send their packages to the Government. The Government must have some place to care for them, and that will involve the establishment of warehouses that will involve the expenditure of vast sums of money, that will necessitate the appointment of new managers, freight clerks, rate clerks, route clerks, and all that, in order to be able to tell what to do with these packages and how and when to send them.

Mr. FOWLER. The question that arose in my mind was this: How would you tell in advance, or how would you estimate in advance, the cost of this work without first having some kind of an experiment with it?

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what I do in my business: If the manager of any branch of my business comes to me and says he wants some new machinery, and it takes $50,000 to buy that and install it, I want to know from him what result he expects to obtain by the investment of that additional money. And unless he can show me with reasonable conclusiveness what the outcome of that investment is to be, he would not get the money. And no man who has been successful in business life in this or any other country ever enters upon any great business enterprise without first knowing what it is going to cost and what the outcome is to be as nearly as possible.

Now, here is what I would propose in this bill:

We propose the appointment of a commission to investigate the parcel-post business everywhere in all its phases; to ascertain just how it has worked where it has been established, and where it has been established what effect it has had on the postal service; what kind of service the people get as the result of the establishment of this branch of the post-office business; how they are satisfied with it; whether it affects the post office by creating a deficiency, or whether it gives them a surplus. We must enter upon this from a business viewpoint. There is no politics in it. There can not be. We realize that there is a great demand for the establishment of a parcel post. Everybody must admit that. But, realizing it, we must also say to the people that we are studying the question, and we must be conscientious in our study of the question.

There is no doubt but that the parcel post is inevitable. It is coming. It may be that it ought to come. I do not say that it cought not to. It may be that it ought to come now. But regardless of the demand, or regardless of how insistent the demand may be, we have the responsibility placed upon us of studying the reasons why we should do the thing that is demanded of us, and if we can show the people who are wanting this parcel post that it ought not to be established until it can be established along intelligent, legitimate business lines, I take it that there is not a man, woman, or child in the United States who will find fault with us for doing our duty conscientiously as we ought to do it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to ask the gentleman what he considers the cause of this more or less general demand for

Mr. MADDEN. Well, so far as I am able to judge, I will tell the gentleman very frankly. We have a lot of very enterprising men in all the great cities of America who are engaged in the mail-order business, and they are really very enterprising and they deserve a great deal of credit for their enterprise. They will send you by express anything from a mule with a harness to a wagon that can be drawn by the mule. They buy the output of factories that make goods everywhere, and they sell them at cheap prices, and they send their catalogues on to the parlor table of every man who lives in a rural district throughout the land, and the two books in common use in the rural districts of the country are the Bible and the catalogue of the mail-order house.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.
Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who made a speech in favor of the parcel post the other day, said that these mail-order houses were enabled to sell their goods cheaper than the local houses because they bought "seconds." Do you think the Government ought to go into partnership with mailorder houses in putting out "seconds" where they illustrate them as beautiful goods and good goods in their books?

Mr. MADDEN The prople of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. The people of the United States who have brains enough to enter upon great business enterprises have genius enough to place their wares before the American people in such an insidious way that even as intelligent a Member of Congress as the gentleman from Omaha is not able to see that he is being influenced by any of their advertising schemes.

Mr. LOBECK. Thank you.
Mr. MADDEN. And so the Government of the United States, if it does enter into partnership with these men, is not to blame, because the Government enters into such partnership through such men as my friend Lobeck, who has had wide experience in business of all kinds and who can form as intelligent a business conception on a proposition as any man in this House. Now, if he can be fooled in that way, why not other men who know as little as I do?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If we pass this bill, or some legislation establishing a commission, how long does the gentleman think ought to be given them in order to make a satisfactory report?

Mr. MADDEN. This bill provides that if the commission is appointed a report shall be made within a year. Is not that right, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. In January, 1914. Mr. MADDEN. They would be obliged to report at that time. Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York. Mr. AKIN of New York. Does not the gentleman believe that if I wish to purchase goods at some point 500 miles from my place and I can save $5 by it, that that $5 is just as good buy the goods in the cheapest place he can buy. Everybody concedes the right to buy in the lowest market and sell in the highest market.

Now, I have thought about this a good deal; perhaps not very systematically, but I have thought about it, and my judgment is based purely on moral grounds. I really feel deal affected by the possibility of the change which will take place in American life in consequence of the establishment of a parcel post. I can very well recollect when I was a boy-that was a good while ago-when in the great city where I live all the streets outlying the business center were lined with shops. The business center in our city is contracted into a little area less than a mile square, and we have a city of 200 square miles in area, with a population of two and one-half millions of people. I recollect when every street outlying this business center was lined with shops, one shop having hardware, the next saddlery and leather goods, and others having dry goods, beets and shoes millions deletions and their saddlery. boots and shoes, millinery, clothing, and all the various kinds of business, each shop dealing in one kind of business or goods. I remember when those streets were lined with these shops, when everything looked clean and bright, and everybody looked happy and prosperous. The boys and girls living in the neighborhood of these shops were employed by the proprietors of the shops, perhaps no shop employing more than 10 or 15 or 20 boys and girls, and some as few as 1 or 2. The customers of the shops were the neighbors who lived around them. The boys and girls who were clerks there got a small or a large trade from their neighbors, depending upon their behavior. The proprietor of the shop was in close harmony with his employees. He took an interest in their welfare. Their neighbors did the same thing. We had a better moral condition then than we had later, or than we have now.

After awhile the idea of department stores entered the mind of some great money holder. He established a department store; he put stalls in his store under this one roof. In one stall he sold dry goods, in the next stall clothing, in the next stall hardware, in the next stall drugs. Next we find the proprietor of one of these outlying stores was obliged to sell his stock. His trade had gone to the department store. He was obliged to look for a job as manager of one of these departments. He was no longer an employer of labor; no longer in business for himself. He became an employee of one of these great department stores. The neighborhood in which he had done business before began to run down. The revenue that was received by the owner of the little building fell off. The neighborhood deteriorated. The boys and girls who were employed in this shop were obliged to go and look for jobs in the department store. Almost invariably they found employment there, but at lower wages. There was nobody in the ownership of the department store who knew the boy or the girl. Each one was checked into the store every morning and out every night like a piece of baggage. There was nobody there to look after their moral well-being. I can remember, when I was chairman of the finance committee of the great city of Chicago, walking along Madison Street one night with the chief of police, Maj. McClowery, now warden of the Leavenworth Peni-We met a very beautiful girl who accosted us. We stopped and talked to her and tried to find out what she was doing walking the streets and what she did for a living during the day. She told us that she was employed by one of the greatest department stores in the world, the greatest department store on earth, employing not less than 15,000 men and women as clerks and doing the greatest business of anything of its kind anywhere. She said that the compensation she received for her work there was so small that she was not able to make a living by it. We went the next day to the proprietor of that sto, e and told him the story. It was a heart-rending story, and I have remembered it ever since, and my heart bleeds at the condition which I then found and which I fear will prevail to a larger extent if we enter upon this enterprise of a parcel post. [Applause.]

What do you do? In every country town you take away the communication between the village and the man who lives on the farm. You do away with the community life. Ah, but you say, in your mercenary way, that this cheapens the distribution of the commodities and the necessities of life. But if you cheapen and degrade and demoralize life with it, what have you gained by the saving of a filthy dollar? Do you put the dollar above the man or the woman or the boy? Are you going to place the dollar above the morals of the Nation? Are you going to stand here in your mercenary way and say to the American to me as to the man in the town?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman would have sufficient intelligence to be allowed to run at large if he did not in the land in the future "? What I fear is that the same thing in a more extensive way will happen through the mail-order houses that has happened in the great cities through the department stores.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. LAFFERTY. I should like to have the gentleman e I should like to have the gentleman explain what he thinks would happen if the express companies should reduce their rates, either voluntarily to the figure that those favoring a parcel post would perhaps fix as the postal rate, or if the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given the power to fix express rates, based on physical valuation, and that commission should then bring down express rates to what some of us think a reasonable figure, which will be offered as an amendment to this parcel-post bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to talk about this subject from a scientific standpoint, for, as I said in the beginning, I have not given to it the study that would enable me to speak about it from the standpoint of an expert; but I really believe that if a parcel post is established it ought to really believe that if a parcel post is established it ought to be established along scientific lines. It is not possible to successfully and profitably conduct the transportation of parcels through the Post Office Department at a flat rate from one end of the American Continent to the other. Somebody, somewhere, somehow, must sit down and figure out how far we can carry a package at a given cost, and then we must have the courage to fix the limit at that age! the courage to fix the limit at that cost.

The Government of the United States ought not to enter upon the establishment of a freight business under which it agrees to carry every package that may be offered to it for carriage for any distance on the American Continent at a flat rate.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield to my colleague. Mr. CANNON. I believe the postage on a letter is 2 cents an ounce.

Mr. MADDEN. Two cents an ounce.

Mr. CANNON. And this small-weight mail substantially furnishes the revenue of the department-I do not know just the proportion, but two-thirds or three-quarters. That service, by law, we monopolize, both for the long haul and the short haul. Wherever a letter goes, if it goes in the mails, it must have a 2-cent stamp on it.

Mr. MADDEN. Except 1 cent in the offices where there are no carriers, for local delivery.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and for circulars, and so forth. Now, I am not an expert touching these matters, but can the gentleman or anybody inform us whether, in conducting a parcel-post system, we can with wisdom and safety take the long hauls and lose the short hauls and do for these packages what we do for the letters? In other words, monopolize the parcel-post business and cut the express companies out entirely?

I take it for granted that if we permanently enact parcel-post legislation at this session of Congress that that is a material question for consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that if we undertake to monopolize the business at the same rate that is fixed in this bill and force the citizens of the United States to send through the post office their parcels at 12 cents a pound rate when they could send them by express for half that money, that we will not find ourselves very enthusiastically approved. Therefore I say that we ought to fix a zone system beyond which we will not carry a package at a given price. We ought to make a price within the zone sufficiently low to take the business away from the express companies, but as a matter of good business judgment and a matter of interest and fair dealing between the Government and the people who own the Government, the representatives of the people can not afford to say to the people that they must pay a fixed flat rate and must give all their business to the Government whether it be a long or a short haul in face of the fact that they can send the business on a short haul for less money than the Government can carry it. There is only one way to do this, and that is to get experts who can figure out exactly how far the Government can carry a given weight for a given price. There ought to be a price fixed for the carriage of a package within the zone fixed that will enable the Government to come out even in the enterprise, and at the same time to give to the people the facilities for the at the same time to give to the people the factories for the transportation of their packages at a price below what the express companies would charge. Then you have got it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. In case we fix a rate by this parcel-post system, will not the express companies meet that rate, and will not the people have the advantage of the low express rates as well as the post-office rates?

Mr. MADDEN. All right; if we fix the rates that will force the express companies to meet us we have accomplished the object. It really does not matter to the people whether they carry a package by express controlled by the railroads or whether they carry them by an express under Government control, by the postal service, provided they can get them carried at a price they think they ought to pay.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.
Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman whether the thought he had given this subject had led him to whether the thought he had given this subject had led him to the conclusion that the making of the rates and regulations for the carrying of these parcels, whether under the form of par-cel post, per se, or under the form of parcel express, was an administrative question and not a legislative question, inasmuch as he spoke of experts being necessary to properly adapt the rates to move the traffic?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is an administrative question if it is being administered by a man who has charge of a business enterprise that is not hedged around by laws which tie the hands of the man who is administering the affairs. a great business enterprise the manager of the business has the power to go either one way or the other. If he can not go on a straight line, he can zigzag; but the man who is managing a department for the Government of the United States is edged to go in the direction which the law points for him to go. He has no discretionary power. So, I say, before you charge him with the responsibility of successfully managing the enterprise you ought to give him the power to regulate the conditions as they ought to be regulated from the viewpoint of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis]. Then I will admit that the gentleman's question as to the administrative features of this proposition is correct.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, this thought was in my mind in connection with the answer made by the gentleman from Illinois to his colleague, as to the meeting of the postage rates by the express companies. Of course, it is principally the rural citizen who is interested in this proposition, and unless your rural route is articulated in some way with the express company, it would be very difficult, it seems to me, for the express company to make a rate that would meet the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a point that I overlooked, I am frank to say. The delivery, of course, has something to do with it.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; in the case of a man 4 or 5 miles out from town.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree that would be a serious objection to the express side of it, but if, as a matter of fact, in fixing a zone system we make a rate low enough to force the express companies to deliver goods, even to points where they would not have to be delivered into rural districts, we would have done something.

Mr. GARRETT. Undoubtedly.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I have said all upon this question that I ought to say. I think that the thing that should be done by Congress above all things in connection with the establishment of a parcel post is to get the information upon which we can act intelligently.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to inquire whether or not as a member of the Post Office Committee the gentleman will explain to the committee here what investigation, if any, the Committee on the Post Office made of the rate fixed in this bill or the facilities for transportation?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand. I was not on the subcommittee that made the investigation for the establishment of the parcel post, but I read the hearings; and if I understood anything from the hearings it was this: That everybody who appeared before the committee made it less clear to the committee about what should be done with respect to the establishment of a parcel post.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, just one question.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. McKENZIE. Are we to understand that the rates fixed in this bill were made simply as a matter of guess?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I will say to my colleague this with relation to the rates: There is an International Postal Union in which 23 countries outside of the United States participate, and to the conventions of the International Postal Union delegates are sent from each of these countries. They have the power to fix the rates for international postage. They have fixed the rate, and it was the International Postal Union that fixed the rate permitting foreigners to send packages up to 11 pounds in weight for 12 cents a pound into any city, town, or hamlet in the United States. The Congress of the United States never took any action on that question, and this I understand to be the first time that any Post Office Committee has recommended the reduction of the rate to the rate fixed by the international union. As a matter of fact, the United States had nothing to say about it. We reduced this to meet that.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rate per pound which is so much talked about, you can send parcels from far away into the United States for 12 cents a pound up to 11 pounds, whereas our own people have to pay more, and can send only 4 pounds. If the gentleman will indulge me to lay a foundation for a question, the number of packages which come in under the International Postal Union agreement would probably not be one ten-thousandth part of the packages that would be carried by the Post Office Department in the event we pass a parcel-post bill.

Now, as I understand the gentleman-and I want to see if I understand him correctly—this treaty for an international par-cel post was a treaty made by the President and ratified by the Senate

Mr. MADDEN. No, no; it is made by the International Postal Union Convention.

Mr. CANNON. I know. But where did he get authority; by treaty?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they made a treaty.

Mr. CANNON. Was it ever by legislation which passed the House?

Mr. MADDEN. No.
Mr. CANNON. Then, the House has, touching the international parcel post, abdicated its power to originate revenue bills, which is very strenuously insisted upon; but I do not care to go into that branch of the matter. Now, the gentleman is ingo into that branch of the matter. Now, the gentleman is in-clined to vote—he is on the committee—for the bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. That would try an experiment for two years.

Mr. MADDEN. That is on the rural routes.

Mr. CANNON. And would put the other into operation for how long?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no limitation upon the time of the other.

Mr. CANNON. No limitation upon the time of the other, but on the rural routes the rates are less.

Mr. MADDEN. The rates are the same, except that below the pound the rates are fixed at varying prices.

Mr. CANNON. At varying prices—that is, as I hastily read the bill—so that this commission is to make its investigation and recommendation by 1914.

Mr. MADDEN. By January, 1914, and the rural route will, if enacted as recommended by the committee, expire by limitation at that time if no other legislation were enacted.

Mr. CANNON. But in the meantime, if this legislation is enacted, we would be having an object lesson with an American parcel post the same as would come from foreign countries. We would be having an object lesson among ourselves.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, Mr. CANNON. And then, in the gentleman's opinion, we would be in a position to legislate with better knowledge than we have now.

Mr. MADDEN. We should be.

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman will permit an observation. It has been shown conclusively, I think, that the 12 cents a pound rate is such that the express companies get the short traffic, and I am equally certain that the situation is such that the express companies would make rates that would take all In short, that there would be no traffic to the long traffic. speak of under this 12 cents a pound rate. Now, will the gentleman tell the committee how he thinks under these circumstances we are conducting any experiment at all with the 12-cent rate?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question right on top of that, because it is along the same line?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the gentleman may be given 10 minutes additional.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes additional time.

Mr. CANNON. Make it 30 minutes if he wants it. He is discussing the bill; the first discussion I have heard of it. I did not hear the gentleman from Tennessee, and have been so busy in my committee work that I have not read his speech. Now, as I understand it, the express company is a public utility, and that as the Interstate Commerce Commission, sustained by decisions of the highest courts, can fix and are fixing the freight tariff with only one limitation that they shall not be confiscatory and, as I understand it, the express company is a common carrier, and if I recollect aright it is the duty by express provision of law it was not necessary, for that matter, that they fix the rates for the express companies; and if that is correct, while I shall vote with the gentleman and with the committee because they have investigated and I have not, but if that statement is correct, there is nothing needed except the activity of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make express rates what they ought to be.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, there is this, I can say in reply to the gentleman from Maryland and also to my colleague, that although the express rates may be reduced to meet fixed for the transportation of packages through the Post Office Department, we must also bear in mind the fact that the express company delivers its package from one point to another and receives it there, while the United States Government will deliver it from one of those points to the other and then hand it to the servant of the United States, the rural carrier or the city carrier, as the case may be, to deliver it to the house, and that while the express company will deliver it to the house consignee in a city within a given radius, it will not deliver to a citizen outside of the city or outside of a given radius of any city, so that even though the rate be lowered by the express company beyond the rate fixed under this bill or any other bill that Congress may enact, the rate of the express company would still be higher than the rate of the Post Office Department because of the added service that the Post Office Department would give to the citizen.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague on the committee.

The gentleman from Illinois, in reply to a Mr. WEEKS. question from his colleague, has correctly stated that one of the reasons for making the rate 12 cents a pound was on account of the international rate. I think he ought to add, as quite likely he will agree with me, that there was another reason which moved the committee to take this action, which was, that the receipts from fourth-class mail, which is substantially a parcel post, now amount to between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, and $5,000,000, and $5,000,000, and $5,000,000, and $5,000,000, and $5,000,000 and $5,000,000, and $5,000, and the department reports the cost of the service at a fraction over 12 cents a pound. Mr. MADDEN. I a I agree exactly with the statement of my colleague, the ranking member of our side of this committee.

Mr. LEWIS. I apologize for this interruption— Mr. MADDEN. You do not need to do so. The gentleman illuminates anything that is being said.

Mr. LEWIS. There is not anything that distinguishes the difference in price in carrying parcels, the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] to the contrary notwithstanding. The class of matter that he is talking about is mail business from half an ounce up to 4 pounds, and is not a line of data applied, as distinguished from this, of pound or weighty shipments. And no one knows in this country what it costs to carry parcels per se. Is not that correct?

Mr. MADDEN. In the face of the statement made by the gentleman from Maryland, to the effect that nobody knows what it costs the Government, does not the gentleman think it would be wise for somebody to find out what it costs the Government before we enter upon this great enterprise?

Mr. LLOYD. It may be true that nobody does know what it costs to carry a package. It is true that the Post Office Department, some two years ago, sent out a statement to the effect that it cost twelve and a fraction cents to carry a pound of fourthclass matter. Whether that is a correct statement or not I do not know. But it is a statement that was given out by the Post Office Department and is the best information we have on that subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Anyway, the committee believed, Mr. Chairman, that the domestic citizen ought to be given the same advantages that are accorded to the people who live in other countries with respect to the shipment of packages through the Post Office Department. That is the real crux of the situation now.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to have the gentleman inform the committee the kind of merchandise that can be transported under this parcel post.

Mr. MADDEN. Any kind of merchandise that can be put in a package of a given size. They limit the size of the package, as I understand it, under the International Postal Union agreement, so that if you can not get 11 pounds in a package of a given size it can not be shipped through the mails, but what that size is I am unable to state.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, with these international shipments the tariff laws of the various countries interfere, and any package shipped from a foreign nation that comes in is subject to our tariff laws. But I want to ask the gentleman if he has any data to which he can refer me, where I can ascertain anything about the amount of these international shipments of packages?

Mr. MADDEN. I really have no information upon the subject that would enable me to give an intelligent reply to the gentleman. I wonder if my colleague on the committee [Mr. Weeks] would be able to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I did not understand the question.

Mr. GARRETT. I have wondered and have made some little effort, but not very much, I must say, to ascertain how much international shipment there was and how much of the parcel mail comes in here under this international postal agreement.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the figures in mind. I can not answer it offhand.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think any member of the committee was able to ascertain just how much the packages shipped from other countries amount to.

Mr. GARRETT. That would be interesting in the study of the question.

But we have a system of clearance between Mr. MADDEN. this country and other countries, through which the balances are settled by this country and by the other countries, and if the balance is in favor of this country the revenues coming from that source do not go into the treasury of the Post Office. So that while the Post Office Department may seem to have a deficit, for example, it might really, as a matter of fact, have a surplus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have just enough time to enable me to answer this question.

Mr. HILL. I would like the gentleman to have time enough also to answer another question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, how much of an extension does the gentleman from Illinois require?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have 10 minutes. Then I wili quit.

Mr. WEEKS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman. He is entitled to all the time he wants. He is a member of the committee, and he is discussing this question in an intelligent way, and therefore he ought to have all the time

[Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. We have a system of taking balances. For instance, if the United States sends packages to a foreign country and that country sends packages to the United States, and our postage amounts to more than their postage does, the balance is settled in our favor by the country owing it. And the balance that comes to the United States, I may say for the information of the House—it being a revelation to me—although the work is performed by the Post Office Department and charged to the expenses of the Post Office Department and its management, yet the surplus revenue coming as a result of that work does not go to the credit of the Post Office Department at all, but goes into the Treasury of the United States, and can not be taken out and used as the ordinary postal receipts are used. And so, while I do not know exactly how much the aggregate of these balances in favor of the United States would amount to in any one year, I am rather impressed with the belief that during the last fiscal year it was several hundred thousand dollars. I am not stating this as an absolute fact, but just as an impression.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now? Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut. Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will kindly take up his bill and refer to page 36 he will observe that it is there provided-

That postage shall be paid on all articles, parcels, or packages entitled to transportation under the provisions of this act as matter of the fourth class on rural mail delivery route only at the following rates: One cent for each 2 ounces or less, 2 cents for more than 2 ounces but not more than 4 ounces, 3 cents for more than 4 ounces but not more than 8 ounces, 4 cents for more than 8 ounces but not more than 12 ounces, 5 cents for more than 12 ounces, 5 cents for more than 12 ounces but not more than a pound, and 2 cents per pound for each additional pound or fraction thereof up to and including a total of 11 pounds.

That fixes the rates on free rural delivery packages at a total of 25 cents on a package weighing 11 pounds. That refers to packages on rural routes only?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

cents referred to an excess charge over and above the 12 cents or is it deducted from the 12 cents? For instance, provided the gentleman lives on a rural route could I mail a package of merchandise from Washington to his house and have it delivered for 12 cents, or would it simply go to the nearest railroad station and from there carry an extra charge for delivery?

Mr. MADDEN. The 12 cents a pound rate is a general rate. which carries the parcel to the termination, no matter where that is, whether in the city, to be delivered by city carrier, or in the country, to be delivered by the rural carrier. But the rural package is confined only to the rural route.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.
Mr. LLOYD. Oh, I do not care to take up the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman explained a moment ago that the balance, under the international arrangement, went into the Treasury and not into the Post Office Department. Is that in accordance with a provision in the treaty?

Mr. MADDEN. No. There is no law that has ever been enacted which enables the Post Office Department to receive the moneys from the international postal revenues. merely a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. PAYNE. It simply goes into the general fund.
Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it simply goes into the general fund.
But it is only fair to say that if it went into the postal revenues, like the sale of stamps and all that, the income of the postal service would show a greater degree of efficiency with relation to its funds than is sometimes shown by the annual report.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman has made a very interesting argument against the parcel post upon two grounds—first, that it would be impracticable at this time to adopt the parcelpost law because we do not know what it would lead to in the way of expenditure; and, second, that it would be a bad thing, if it was practicable, to have cheaper rates of transportation. I should like to ask the gentleman if he knows what is the nature of this American League of Associations, of which H. B. nature of this American League of Associations, of which H. D. Lyford, of the firm of Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co., of Chicago, is chairman; E. B. Moon, of Chicago, is executive secretary; and D. I. Williams, of Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, is general secretary, who are sending out literature and maintaining a junta at room 310, Maryland Building, Washington, D. C., and what is the interest of that junta in this legislation? The gentleman mentioned the greatest department store in the world as being inimical to the best interests of Chicago. hold here a letter from this American League of Associations, of which D. I. Williams, of Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, is general secretary, against the parcel post. I should like to have the gentleman go into that if he can.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I am not in the confidence of these men, that I have no relation with them in any manner, shape, or form, and that I am not able to answer the gentleman's question. I am not a seer. I am not able to see into the future or into the past.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow
Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think it wise to follow his discussion of this bill as it has proceeded, to give information, and that it is unwise to get up some cry about a junta and try to switch the House to a prejudice by bringing in the plutocrats?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not attempted to argue against the establishment of a parcel post at all, if I understand my own attitude. I have tried to state the facts as I see them, realizing that at some time or other in the not-far-distant future we will be obliged to establish a parcel post. My contention is and has been and will be that we ought to have the information upon which to base intelligent action, and that is what I hope we will have; not only in connection with this legislation, but with all other important legislation that may be undertaken by this Congress. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. Madden was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. , Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, Clyde H. Tavenner has written some very interesting and instructive articles upon the sub-ject of the tariff and the strike at Lawrence, Mass., and in his letters exposing the condition of the workers at the Lawrence mills and calling the attention of the public to the manner in Mr. HILL. Now, if you turn to section 8 you will find it letters exposing the condition of the workers at the Lawrence provides "that hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound." Is the 25 which 92,000,000 of American citizens are being outrageously taxed in order that a few greedy trust magnates may be still further enriched he has done a splendid work for the cause of honest and intelligent tariff reform and very much for the cause of the masses of the people.

These letters have so favorably impressed Hon. James T. LLOYD, of Missouri, chairman of the Democratic national congressional committee, that he has caused some of them to be supplied to about 2,600 newspapers in the smaller cities and towns of the United States.

I desire to insert some of them in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

[From the Peoria (III.) Star.] (By Clyde H. Tavenner.)

(By Clyde H. Tavenner.)

It so happens that since the first attempt of this House to reduce the tariff on woolens, and thus reduce the cost of living to every man, woman, and child in the United States, which attempt was made fruitless because of President Taft's veto, there has been a strike of 30,000 men, women, and children workers in the great textile mills of the Woolen Trust at Lawrence, Mass.

This strike revealed, to the utter disgust of thousands of Americans of both parties who had previously placed more or less confidence in the principle of protection for protection's sake, but who now stand ready to denounce it at the poils at the first opportunity, that those millionaire Woolen Trust magnates who have been coming to Congress and obtaining excessive protection on the ground they were paying "American wages" and giving fair and decent treatment to their employees, have been handing out pure buncombe and working a gigantic double-barreled conspiracy on both consumers and employees.

The revelations springing from that strike have demonstrated to the satisfaction of even thousands of patrictic Republicans in this Nation that those Woolen Trust magnates have used the high tarlif on woolen goods only to enrich themselves. Having obtained a monopoly on the American market, the Woolen Trust has forced the consumer to pay exorbitant prices for blankets, underwear, and all kinds of women's and children's dress goods, and while growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice themselves they have forced their men, women, and even little children employees to accept starvation wages and have treated them almost like animals.

Washington, D. C., January 25, 1912.

Driven from pillar to post for explanations to justify the Payne-Aldrich tariff tax, stand-pat protectionists long ago waived the theory that the foreigner pays the tariff and now stand on the assurance to the people that a prohibitive tariff is for the protection of "American" workingmen.

When Schedule K, which places a heavy tax on every article of woolen clothing worn by every man, woman, and child in the Nation, was up for discussion, Aldrich, Lodge, Smoot, and other special-privilege servers of the House and Senate declared their principal motive in levying a tax on these articles was to "protect" the "American" workingmen in the woolen industry.

Schedule K became a law, the prices of all kinds of clothing, made wholly or in part of wool, have advanced, and the combinations of manufacturers who contributed heavily to the Republican Party to have Schedule K framed and passed have made millions. But how have the "American" workingmen been "protected"?

The strike of 15,000 textile workers at Lawrence, Mass., one of many similar illustrations which might be given, throws some light on the subject. It puts the lie to the statement that Schedule K protects the "American" workman, because the information shows there are scarcely any "American" workman, because the information shows there are scarcely any "American" workman because the information shows there are scarcely any "American" workers left in the woolen manufacturing industry to protect. The mill owners have "protected" the "American" workman because the information shows there are scarcely any "American" workers left in the woolen manufacturing industry to protect. The mill owners have "protected" the "American" workingmen by driving them from their employment with low wages and unbearable working conditions, and by filling their places with contract laborers from the south of Europe. Effty-two different nationalities are represented by the strikers at represented by the strikers at Jawresco, there.

Bayonets and decreased wages for the men, women, and children workers, instead of the workingman's paradise, pictured by Aldrich, Longe, and Smoot, is the definition of Schedule K that the mill workers at Lawrence are learning by actual experience.

BRINGING IN CHEAP LABOR.

In view of the strike of textile workers at Lawrence, Mass., it is interesting to know how the woolen mill owners attract cheap labor to their mills. Congressman A. P. Gardel, of Massachusetts, while speaking one day in the House, not on the fariff, but on the subject of immigration, contributed some valuable information. Mr. Garden is a stand-pat protectionist of the Aldrich school.

"For example," said Mr. Gardel, "suppose I am a Syrian conducting a Syrian boarding house in the city of Lowell, Mass. Perhaps some mill sends down to me for hands. I furnish them at a somewhat lower rate of wages than is expected by ordinary citizen help (American help). I find recurrent opportunities to supply the cotton mills with Syrians.

mill sends down to me for names. I turnish them at a most of wages than is expected by ordinary citizen help (American help). I find recurrent opportunities to supply the cotton mills with Syrians.

"Soon I hear that another mill is about to make an extension, so I say to myself, 'Back there in Syria is quite a profitable mine for me,' Perhaps I go to the mill treasurer and get an advance of money. Perhaps I have the money myself.

"I return to Syria or I send some trusted agent, very likely a Syrian resident of the United States. In Syria a number of emigrants are gathered together, and they come to America, and either by direct or indirect route, finally arrive at my boarding house in the city of Lowell. I tell them that if they do not pay me back the money advanced I will have them arrested; that they must hand over the full wages that they get in the mill on penalty of imprisonment. Everyone knows how easy it is for a stranger to break the laws or the ordinances in a land where he does not understand the language, and they are held in terror of the police.

he does not inderstant the languages while I feed them and keep them police.

"Meanwhile I take all their wages while I feed them and keep them alive just as I would feed and keep a horse alive that I had imported for use in a livery stable."

(By Clyde H. Tavenner.)

Washington, D. C., February 1, 1912.

Here is some more evidence of how "protection" does not protect the workingman.

The following is an extract from an appeal sent by the 30,000 men, women, and children, striking textile workers at Lawrence, Mass., to William M. Wood, president of the Woolen Trust:

"We are of the opinion that you have had ample time to consider the demands of the men, women, and children who have made the American Woolen Co. what it is to-day. In view of the fact that machinery has been improved, the workers turn off more and more work, but they are not paid accordingly, even though the price of food, clothing, and shelter has in many cases increased 50 and even 100 per cent within the last few years.

"We, the committee, are willing to meet the officials of the company at any time and submit the grievances of the strikers. So if you believe in a square deal you will not refuse to meet with us, but will come forward at once and try to bring the trouble to a final conclusion. You must bear in mind that the fact that these men, women, and children have not gone on strike for light or transient causes, but because they could no longer bear up under the burdens laid upon their shoulders. The American Woolen Co. has within the last few years built several mills, which are paid for, according to your own figures, and the company has even in the worst of times managed to pay dividends.

"The workers are of the opinion that the only competition left is the struggle among themselves for a miserable job at $6, $7, or $8 a week."

This is kow Schedule K "protects" the workingman, solely for whose

This is how Schedule K "protects" the workingman, solely for whose benefit the Payne-Aldrich bill (according to Payne and Aldrich) was penent the Payne-Aldrich out (according to PAYNE and Aldrich) was passed.

Since the protectionists admit that Schedule K, which places a heavy tax on every article of woolen ciothing sold in the United States, was designed solely to benefit the workingmen in the woolen industry, and since the $6, $7, and $8 wages paid by the Woolen Trust demonstrates beyond successful contradiction that Schedule K does not protect the workers, why should the American people longer tolerate Schedule K?

Washington, D. C., February 4, 1912.

Washington, D. C., February 4, 1912.

While 30,000 men, women, and children mill workers at Lawrence, Mass., were out of work because of a strike to prevent a cut in their $6, $7, and $8 a week wages, Mrs. Evelyn Walsh McLean, mother of the baby that is heir to $100,000,000, gave a $35,000 dinner to 50 guests at Washington, the Nation's Capital.

The hostess at this banquet wore diamonds that actually cost more than half a million dollars. In her hair was displayed the famous "Hope" diamond, which cost $180,000, and at her throat another celebrated gem, "Star of the East," which is even larger than the Hope diamond.

SEVEN HUNDRED DOLLARS PER PLATE.

The cost per plate at the McLean dinner was $700. One item in the expense was for 4,000 yellow lillies imported from abroad at $2 each.

One of the highest-paid will workers at Lawrence would have to work $4$ years to earn the cost of that banquet. The earnings of a dozen mill workers for half a century would not purchase the gems worn by Mrs. McLean. A Lawrence worker would have to labor 20 years to pay for the yellow lillies alone.

The strike of the men, women, and children at Lawrence, and the $700-a-plate dinner at Washington is a striking example of conditions existing under a system of excessive protection in the year of our Lord 1012. Neither the Lawrence strike nor the McLean dinner are exceptions. They are but samples of many similar illustrations which could be cited if space permitted. Only recently William M. Wood, the head of the Woolen Trust, whose employees are now on a strike at Lawrence, was arrested for knocking down and running over a pedestrain with his automobile. When arraigned in court he was asked how many automobiles he owned, and his reply was that he did not know. Imagine a man so rich that he does not know how many autos he has on hand!

A WRONG SYSTEM.

A WRONG SYSTEM.

A WRONG SYSTEM.

Fortunes which make it possible for one woman to wear half a million dollars' worth of diamonds at one time and which enables a man to own so many automobiles he is unable to keep track of them necessarily come through the power to place an artificial price on the things which the common people must have in order to live.

It is significant, in this connection, that the tariff, the cost of living, $700-a-plate dinners—everything but the workingman's wages—have increased hand in hand, revealing the intimate relationship of one to the other.

Washington, February 6, 1912.

There are two sides to the strike of the 30,000 men, women, and children textile workers at Lawrence, Mass. The big press associations necessarily can not go into all of the details of the situation, for the reason that many of these details are not, strictly speaking, "news." The desperate struggle the mill workers have experienced in living on $6, $7, and $8 per week wages paid them by the Woolen Trust is one of the features of the situation that has escaped general attention.

When it is considered that every man, woman, and child in the United States is taxed on every article of clothing they purchase "in order that the workers in the woolen industry may receive a fair day's wage," the strike becomes of national importance. The conditions being revealed at Lawrence show that Schedule K is an absolute failure so far as "protecting" the employees in the woolen industry is concerned.

The strike is demonstrating that the only viewpoint form so far as "protecting" the employees in the woolen industry is concerned.

The strike is demonstrating that the only viewpoint from which Schedule K is a success is that it is making the people pay exorbitant rates for woolen clothing and blankets and making millionaires out of the men vaho contributed large sums to the Republican campaign fund with the understanding that Schedule K would be framed and passed by a Republican Congress.

In striking contrast to the $6, $7, and $8 wages paid the men, women, and children mill workers and the proposed reduction of 22 cents a week, which is responsible for the strike, are the following facts as to the enormous profits of the woolen mills:

The amount paid out in dividends by the American Woolen Co. in 1902 was $1,400,000. In 1911 it was $2,800,000. The capital in 1902 was $4,501,100, and in 1911 was $60,000,000. The capital increased 20 per cent. Dividends increased 100 per cent.

Those who complain of higher prices of sheddy, of cotton where there should be wool to protect the human body from winter chill, should know all about Lawrence, because Lawrence is positive proof of the big, double-pointed political lie of the year of our Lord 1912.

The whole argument on which tariff protection is based is this; "You give us protection against foreign labor, and we will be able to pay American wages to American workingmen." The strike at Lawrence, together with the report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the wage situation in the steel industry, which shows that men work under almost incredible conditions, reveals beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the whole fabric of the tariff protectionists is woven of the most sordid of lies and almost unbelievable greed.

Protection for the purpose of creating monopolies for American manufacturers has proven unwise. The people are permitting themselves to be taxed for nothing. But will they see it?

As a result of the Payne-Aldrich tariff tax every person in the United States is paying from 30 to 100 per cent more for woolen clothing and blankets than the resident of Great Britain pays. And the woolen clothing put out by the American Woolen Trust is much inferior in quality to that sold in Great Britain.

William M. Wood, head of the Woolen Trust, draws down the bulk of the enormous profits extorted from the American people.

Marien E. Pew, a newspaper man who will not write an article unless he has the assurance that his paper will publish the facts as he finds them, was sent to Lawrence, Mass, to make an impartial investigation of the strike of the men, women, and children there. This is what he wrote about Wood:

"The story of the career of William M. Wood, president of the American Woolen Co., provides a curious paradox.

"This man is the oppressor of 150,000 miserable New England textile workers; a few years ago he was one of them. He is pitlless in his fight against the 30,000 strikers of Lawrence; in his youth he felt the sting of hunger that these strikers now rebel against.

"Fortune has smiled upon him and he has grown enormously rich; he declares that $4 and $9 per week is enough for the men and women who spin the product of his mills.

"It is said of George F. Baer, the anthracite baron, that he sincercly believes in his famous theory of the divine right of wealth. J. Plerpont Morgan was born to large fortune and has never seen the poverty of the steel slaves of Pittsburgh, though it is inconceivable that he does not know that it exists.

"Other great captains of industry are so comfortable in their clubs and palaces or so busy playing with the folbes of society that they may never think of what is happening beyond the vision of their dividends.

"Not so with Wood. He knows. These strikers are his neighbors. Their distress he sees. Their crices he hears.

"Wood's father was a Portuguese Jew immigrant. He labored in a cotton mill and died of tuberculosis, a disease common to cotton and wool spinners.

"The father's name is believed to have been Alphonse Lehair, or Levair. He changed his name to Wood by order of the mill bosses, who, in those days, listed their employees by name instead of number, and bookkeepers didn't like to fuss with strange, foreign names.

"William quit school when his father died. He got a job in the Wamsutta Mills, New Bedford. The boy was quick to learn. After a while he entered a bank and learned finance. Then he became treasurer of a Fall River cotton mill. He finally mastered the art of manufacturing and assisted in the introduction of shoddy cloth.

"Wood met and married the daughter of Frederick Ayer, who had made a great fortune out of patent medicines.

"Ayer had been buying mill stock, and the mills had not been prospering. He backed his son-in-law with millions, however, and, by a combination, adroitly managed tactics, including shoddy, Schedule K, and labor crushing. Wood made Ayer's fortune swell to proportions that made even the patent-medicine game seem tame.

"The son of the poor mill worker became a millionaire and formed the present Wool Trust.

"A few weeks ago he was in Washington banqueting the stand-pat Senators and Representatives and Taft's Tariff Board and pleading for tariff protection for his employees.

"To-day he is in Boston, giving out statements that trade conditions do not warrant meeting the demands of the strikers who left their looms rather than accept a cut in wages averaging only 22 cents per week.

"Wood says that no dividends are paid on the common stock of his their looms rather than accept a cut in wages averaging only 22 cents per week.

"Wood says that no dividends are paid on the common stock of his company and only 7 per cent on the preferred.

"The fact is that the common stock is treasury stock, and the company has been stowing away an enormous surplus while the tariff salling was good.

"Wood is a dark-eyed, black-haired, nervous little man, with a vain conception of his power to control men—his workers, stockholders, politicians, editors, anyone and everyone who comes between him and the desired result.

"Wood works desperately hard at his business game in and out of season. It is said here that he keeps at such a high nervous tension that he can not compose himself to sleep at night until a massagist has operated upon him.

Are the American people willing to continue to contribute to Mr. Wood by paying more for shoddy than good woolen clothing sells for in England, or do they want the tariff on woolens reduced?

The Woolen Trust, having found that bayonets would not compel its $6, $7, and $8 a week workers to call off their strike at Lawrence, Mass., is now utilizing the hunger of little children as a club to force the parents to return to work at reduced wages.

This is how the trust is using its new weapon:
Charitable organizations in several eastern cities, after reading of the desperate straits to which the strikers' children had been reduced, made arrangements to have hundreds of those children cared for in homes outside of Lawrence until the strike ended. Under this plan a few children were sent away, all of them going to reputable families.
With the knowledge that their children were being cared for tenderly, the mothers and fathers back in Lawrence gained courage to carry on their fight. Freed from their little ones' cry for bread, the strikers took renewed hope.

renewed lope.

What happened? The trust magnates, realizing that if all the little children were sent away from Lawrence the strikers could longer endure the struggle, at once issued orders to the servile police and militia commanders to put a stop to the deportation of the children. These magnates knew that where bayonets, persecutions, unlawful imprisonment, and all the other ordinary weapons of big corporations in fighting unions might fail, there remained one thing which the strikers could not long resist, and that was the suffering of their own children. The millionaires knew that while strong men and women could suffer in silence themselves they could not long bear to see their children hungry.

Accordingly, the order was issued to keep the children there. Immediately a squad of soldiers went to the stations, and when the strikers arrived with their children many of the mothers and fathers were clubbed and thrown into jail.

Diabolical as this may seem, it actually is being done, not in Russia, but right here in the United States.

The Woolen Trust, be it remembered, is the most highly protected of all the trusts. It makes millions of dollars annually in profits on stock that is watered until it is soggy.

Query: Since Aldrich and Smoor declared that Schedule K—which places a tax on every article of clothing used in the United States—was passed for the "protection" of the workers in the woolen industry, and since these workers receive not protection, but clubs and bayonets, why should Schedule K be longer tolerated?

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1913.

Nothing in the history of American tariff making has so thoroughly demonstrated the fallacy of the high-protection principle as the testimony of the Lawrence (Mass.) strikers before the House Rules Com-demonstrated the fallacy of the high-protection principle as the testimony of the Lawrence (Mass.) strikers before the House Rules Committee.

The Woolen Trust is the especial pet of the high protectionists. In order that this trust may enjoy immunity from foreign competition, every man, woman, and child in the country pays tribute. All along this trust has said: "We must have a high tariff in order to protect our workmen. We can't pay American wages if we have to compete with the cheap labor of Europe."

The Rules Committee of the House summoned some of the strikers to Washington, and in the same room where Carnegie and Perkins told how they juggled millions, this committee heard fathers, mothers, and children tell how whole families were forced to live on $5 and $6 a week paid by the highly protected Woolen Trust. The witnesses told how they were forced to work 10 hours a day, how they had to use "a sort of molasses" as a substitute for butter, how children had to go into the mills at an early age in order to keep the family from actual starvation, and how the constant demand of the mill owners was for more and more speed.

In the committee room sat some of the mill children. They were fresh from the mills, and a mere glance at them told more than spoken volumes could tell. All had pinched faces. All were poorly dressed, some of them having only a cheap sweater in lieu of coat and overcoat. All had duil, expressionless faces, in which there was no trace of color or animation. All of them, moreover, were slightly deaf, because of their work amid the fearful clatter of the mill machinery, so that at times the committee members almost had to shout to make themselves heard.

Among them was one little Italian girl—Camilla Teoli by name—times the committee members aimost had to shout to make themselves heard.

Among them was one little Italian girl—Camilla Teoli by name—who had caught her hair in a shafting and had suffered the aimost total loss of her scalp. She was unable to work for a year, during which she received not a cent in damages or compensation. When at last she was able to get out of her bed, she went back into the mills at a reduced wage, because she wasn't as strong as formerly.

All the children looked worn and old, as though they had been speeded up beyond the limit of endurance.

These children revealed, as nothing else could reveal, that "protecting American workingmen" is the last thought of the Woolen Trust. They stood as living proof that the motive in seeking a high tariff on wool was greed.

Now that you know the truth, Mr. Reader, what are you going to do about it? If you do not know just what action to take to make your feeling in the matter effective, here is a suggestion: You can vote against the party that framed Schedule K, and for the party that stands pledged to reduce the tariff on woolens almost one-half.

That the "cheap foreign labor" of Europe, which the American trusts hold up as a bugaboo to frighten the workers of this country whenever tariff legislation is pending, is really better paid than the workmen in the highly protected Woolen Trust factories is shown by a comparison of the wage scales in the cloth mills of the United States and England.

"Cheap foreign labor" is the constant wall of the trusts, "We must have protection against this cheaper labor in order to pay our workmen American wages," they argue, and, then, as soon as they get the protection they immediately begin to gouge the consumer, and at the same time push their own wage scale down below that of the foreign mills with which they were in such frantic fear of competition. The following table will show what spinners are paid in the trust mills here and in the mills of free-trade England:

In England, full time, per week. In Lawrence, full time, per week.

In England, Juli time, per i	Deck.	In Lawrence, just time, per week.
MEN.		MEN.
Warpers Weavers (2 looms) Weavers (4 looms)	9. 00 7. 50 5. 50	Spinners $5.10 to $7.70 Carders 6.00 to 8.00 Combers 5.10 to 7.70 Drawers 5.00 to 7.70 Cop spinners 5.10 to 7.70 Twisters 5.00 to 6.10 Mule spinners 5.00 to 14.50 Weavers (12 looms) 10.00
WOMEN. Adults (average)	5. 00 3. 75	WOMEN. Combers (adults) 5. 10 Drawers (adults) 5. 00 Cop spinners 5. 10 Twisters 5. 00 Warp spoolers (girls) 5. 50

Different systems are used in the two countries, but where a direct parallel can be drawn the rate of pay is shown to be in favor of the English workman. The American Woolen Trust pays its weavers by the piece, and this makes his average for attending looms about 83 cents per loom, whereas in England the same sort of workman, for attending two looms, receives $5.50 per week, or $2.75 per loom.

The Woolen Trust is the most highly protected of all the trusts. It has shouted this cry of "cheap foreign labor" so long that many people have come to think that the workers in American mills, working under what the trusts call the "American standard," are magnates besides their low-paid English brethren. The reverse is true. The Woolen Trust wants protection for the sole reason that through protection it is saved from foreign competition and thus left free to gouge the American consumer at will. The workmen in the trust mills, mean-while, are given no share of these enormous profits which the trust takes from the people.

JUST LOOK AT THIS—CONSUMERS ARE BEING MADE THE GOLT AGAIN.

JUST LOOK AT THIS-CONSUMERS ARE BEING MADE THE GOAT AGAIN.

JUST LOOK AT THIS—CONSUMERS ARE BEING MADE THE GOAT AGAIN.

Anyone who thinks those millionaire Woolen Trust magnates at Lawrence, Mass., are increasing the salaries of their men, women, and children mill workers out of the generosity of their hearts—and out of their own pocketbooks—are mistaken. They are making the American people pay not only the amount of the increased wages, but every penny of the expense of the long strike.

"The people sympathized with the strikers" is the slogan of the mill owners; "now let them shoulder the expense."

Before any wages were increased the Woolen Trust magnates, who have been making profits of from 6 to 75 per cent on their investment, decided to advance the cost of clothing. And, as a matter of fact, the consumers began to actually pay increased prices for woolens and cottons in anticipation of the increased wages to be paid by the Woolen Trust before the announcement of the increased wages was made public. Cotton prints, calicoes, and the like have risen in price at wholesale in New York City a quarter of a cent in the last 10 days, and mill agents predict the increases will reach 2 cents a yard.

This will make a difference of 5 cents in an apron and 25 cents in the housewife's dress. Men's clothing is going up, and women's and children's woolen dress goods are declared to be next in line. The increases, it is estimated, will bring approximately $12,000,000 into the coffers of the Woolen Trust within a year. Thus an accommodating public will bear the cost of the strike and increases in wages.

The men who work such games as this on both public and employees are but a handful in number. They are just a few rich men who own or control the majority of the stock of the Woolen Trust. It is practically these few men, and they alone, who are the sole beneficiaries of Schedule K.

Again the query: How long are 92,000,000 American citizens going to stand for a wool tariff, which taxes them outrageously on every stitch

Again the query: How long are 92,000,000 American citizens going to stand for a wool tariff, which taxes them outrageously on every stitch of clothing they use, merely in order that a few greedy Woolen Trust magnates may be still further enriched?

When a woman purchases $10 worth of woolen dress goods, $4.87 of that $10 represents the actual value of the goods and the remaining $5.13 of the $10 the amount of the tariff. In other words, should the same purchase be made in England, where there is no tariff on woolens, the woman would receive the same amount and quality of dress goods for $4.87 that she pays $10 for in this country.

This is because of the Payne-Aldrien ad valorem tariff of 105 per cent on this class of goods. When the Democrats came into power in the House of Representatives they framed a bill reducing the tax on woolens nearly 40 per cent. Had this bill been permitted to become a law the price of woolens would have been reduced to every consumer in the United States. But President Taft vetoed the bill. The Democratic majority of the House now presents the bill again.

The President, however, will have less excuse to veto the measure than he had before. He declared the first time that a certain Tariff Board had not made its report, and that to permit a reduction of the duties might make it impossible for the woolen manufacturers to "protect" their workmen.

The Tariff Board has now reported, showing that wages in the woolen industry are as high abroad as in this country in many instances. Then there has been a strike of the woolen mill workers at Lawrence, Mass., which has revealed beyond argument and beyond contradiction that the Woolen Trust magnates have been fooling and cheating the public all the time.

The strike of the $6, $7, and $8 a week men, women, and children in the woolen mills brought to light the fact that while the mill owners have been declaring they were "protecting" their workers by giving them starvation wages and treating them almost like animals.

The last leg has been knocked from under the wool-tax argument, and President Taft has no excuse left to explain a veto of the Democratic downward-revision wool bill.

It will be impossible to fool

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1912.

Washington, March 28, 1912.

The sugar industry in the United States, according to the wall going up from protectionists, will be ruined by the bill removing the tax from sugar, reducing the price to the consumer approximately 2 cents a pound. This, then, will be the fourth time the industry will have been "ruined," according to protectionists—always according to protectionists.

The standpatters said the industry would be ruined when Porto Rico sugar was admitted free. But it wasn't. Then they said it would surely perish when Philippine sugar was admitted free, and gave up the same cry when Cuban sugar was given a downward revision. During this time of "ruin" cane-sugar production in this country increased materially and beet-sugar production more than doubled, but the price of sugar has never censed to advance to the consumer. The wholesale price of standard granulated sugar on the day this item is written is $5.85 per 100 pounds. One week ago to-day it was $5.75; one month ago to-day, $5.45; and one year ago, $4.60.

Whether the Sugar Trust finds it necessary to increase prices to reimburse itself for the stolen millions it was forced to disgorge to the Government, following the exposure of the underweighing frauds, or whether the increases are actually justified by a shortage of sugar production abroad is considered a debatable question by many. But the fact that the wholesale price of sugar in London averages 2 cents a pound less than in the United States the year around shows the advantage in favor of the consumers of the country where there is neither a sugar tariff nor a Sugar Trust.

WHERE UNDERWOOD STANDS.

WHERE UNDERWOOD STANDS.

Chairman Underwood, of the Ways and Means Committee, was interrupted in his speech against the sugar tax by a Louisiana Member, who inquired of Mr. Underwood what he anticipated would happen to the sugar industry of his State if the tax was taken off of sugar. Mr. Underwood stated that, in all frankness to the gentleman from Louisiana, that he did not know what would happen to the sugar industry of that State, but that he did know that the sugar production of Louisiana was less than one-tenth of the entire sugar consumption in the United States, and that he did not believe in the principle of taxing 92,000,000 people in order that a few sugar producers in one State might make more profit.

TWO SUGAR TRUST CHECKS.

When the bill to repeal the tax on sugar was up for discussion in the House Asher C. Hinds, of Maine, arose and loudly proclaimed that the ledger of the Sugar Trust in New York would show that the trust had sent checks to the campaign managers of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. Mr. Hardwick, of Georgia, replied. He said that what Mr. Hinds had stated was true, but that the same book also showed that the check intended for the Democratic campaign fund had been returned uncashed, whereas the one sent to the Republicans had been cashed and spent.

RICH MEN BEAR SMALL BURDEN IN COUNTRY-OWN 90 PER CENT OF WEALTH AND SHOULDER 10 PER CENT OF BURDEN-SIGNIFICANT STORY.

AND SHOULDER 10 PER CENT OF BURDEN—SIGNIFICANT STORY.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1912.

Is it just that the men who own 90 per cent of the wealth of the United States should shoulder but 10 per cent of the burden of taxation for running the Government?

The Democratic House of Representatives believes that it is not, and hence the passage of the excise income-tax bill, which levies a tax of 1 per cent on incomes in excess of $5,000 a year.

This does not mean that all persons having more than $5,000 must pay a tax on the excess of that sum. It means that those who have an annual "income" or "profit" of more than $5,000 must pay the 1 per cent on the excess of $5,000. It will be necessary for a man to draw a higher salary than $5,000 a year or to have a capitalized sum of about $100,000 before he is called upon to pay 1 per cent tax on that portion in excess of $5,000.

This is class legislation, the standpatters and protectionists say. They were never heard to complain, however, of the existing class legislation which permits the burden of Federal taxation to fall entirely upon the shoulders of the masses, taxing the average man, woman, and child on every stitch of clothing they wear and everything else they must have in order to live, while permitting all forms of wealth to go untaxed.

The masses of the people produce the wealth, and by legislative ad-must have in order to live, while permitting all folius of wealth to go untaxed.

The masses of the people produce the wealth, and by legislative advantage a few get possession of it, and now these few object to the transfer to wealth of even the amount of revenue derived from the taxation of sugar, but one of the 500 things on which a tariff is levied. They would prefer that the Government continue to tax sugar instead of wealth, because they eat no more sugar than the section hand or the mill worker, and, therefore, under the present system are compelled to pay no greater tax to the Federal Government than does the poorest man. These facts may read strange, but they are facts, and will not be contradicted.

The United States is practically the only one of the great nations to-day that raises practically all its revenue by taxing the people according to their needs and practically according to their poverty and allows wealth to go untaxed, so far as the raising of money to build battleships, maintain the Army, and run the Government are concerned.

If a fiscal system which requires a millionaire to pay no more tax to the Federal Government than the section hand or the factory worker is fair and just, there is no need of reform; but if such a system is unjust, the excise income tax is a move in the right direction to remedy it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] 15 minutes.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in speaking to-day is to explain to this House the methods that have been employed by some of the postmasters and the Post Office Department in trying to harm me in a way. I have in my hand nearly 100 scurrilous postal cards that were sent to me through the post office, the sending of which was countenanced by the postimaster in the city of Amsterdam, N. Y. I propose to show by the report of the post-office inspector that the postmaster there knew all about it, but did not understand the rules and regulations, although he had been in office 10 years; also the methods that were employed in the Post Office Department to change the name of a post office which was named after my father 35 years ago, not upon his request, but simply as an honor to him.

Mr. Chairman, I have noticed in the newspapers for several days certain remarks in relation to myself and my attitude in regard to a change of name of the post office named after my father at Akin, N. Y. This action to change the name of this post office was instigated by one Arthur W. Kline, at one time employed as my secretary, but who is not now acting in that capacity on account of his disloyalty and unfaithfulness, monumental gall and audacity, and mental stupidity, which will appear from a letter which I have in my possession and which I will ask to have inserted in the Record. Since he left my service he has been endeavoring to justify himself in his actions toward me by writing certain articles for the newspapers intended to place me in a wrong light. He also took advantage of the use of the post office for the purpose of sending me very nearly 100 scurrilous postal cards, which the post-office inspector who had charge of the investigation of the fraudulent use of the post office for that purpose found that the postmaster, who had been in office for 8 or 10 years, knowingly allowed to pass through said post office, or overlooked, by reason of his absence from the post office, at that time attending a political conference; and when his attention was called to this fact he crawled out of it by saying that he did not know what the rules and regulations were in regard to such matter.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. WEEKS.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is going to submit any evidence of what the postmaster to whom he has referred has stated?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I have the report of the inspector in regard to sending the postal cards.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the gentleman if the inspector states in his report that the postmaster was away attending political conferences instead of attending to his duties?

Mr. AKIN of New York. No; but I was right there, and I know that he was not there, but was away attending a political I filed charges in the Post Office Department so that the Post Office Department might be able to ferret it out. There were letters written by different men who were mixed up in the affair who said that Mr. Liddle was here and Mr. Liddle was there, and that they talked with him about matters in regard to the selection of a Supreme Court judge.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. AKIN of New York. I will. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman how he was so fortunate as to get the report of the inspector? Mr. AKIN of New York. That I do not care to tell. I got it in a perfectly proper way. I asked for it and got it.
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Whom did the gentleman

Whom did the gentleman ask? Mr. AKIN of New York. I do not care to state. I state that with all kindness to the gentleman.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I do not care to embarrass the

Mr. AKIN of New York. Oh, the gentleman is not embarrassing me at all.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. But I do not understand how the gentleman was able to get the report of an inspector in that

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman will look back to the remarks I made some time ago, he will see very clearly that this man has had charges preferred against him and that the department has not done anything about it, and also that I sent a letter to the President of the United States asking him to take some action in the matter.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. But I am not interested in that.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Oh, there are very many things that you gentlemen are not interested in on that side, and especially in matters of this kind when they come up. [Laughter.]

Think of it, Mr. Chairman, a man who had held the office of postmaster for eight years paying so little attention to the office that he does not know the rules and regulations in regard to obscene and scurrilous postal cards, and yet this same post-master is retained in office by the administration, which had been notified repeatedly as to this man's inefficiency and ignorance of such rules.

I also wish to have inserted in the RECORD the name of one other person interested in the changing of the name from Akin to Fort Johnson, who is no other person than a former Member of Congress of this House, by the name of Lucius N. Littauer, who became famous by his notorious and fraudulent transactions with the War Department just previous to the closing of Mr. Roosevelt's administration; and, although his transactions are public records, yet by reason of the thimblerigging and the close affiliations and associations of this political beach comber, a man utterly distrusted, with whom no decent man would associate himself, and, furthermore, in whose company no respectable person living in his neighborhood would be found, whom no honest man would trust as far as he could throw a bull by the tail, I have been unable to procure the records from the War Department, as they are withheld by the department in order to protect this Littauer from exposure on account of his fraudulent transactions with the War Department.

To substantiate my position in reference to this man Kline, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD clippings from newspapers bearing their respective dates and copies of letters in the Post Office Department, as well as Post Office Inspector Daily's report in regard to Kline's questionable use of the mails to discredit me. It is not that I care, Mr. Speaker, what they call the village in which I live; I simply want to show the motives of all the active participants in this move to cast reflection on me.

Furthermore, I wish to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to the brief prepared by C. P. Grandfield, First Assistant Postmaster General, wherein he claims that he told me the status of the I wish to call attention to the letter which I wrote to Mr. Grandfield, and then, by looking carefully at his answer, you will see that he did not give me the status of the case, and when he made that brief it was misleading and a falsehood; he did not answer the questions I asked him at all.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I can not yield now, as I have only

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield the gentleman additional time to answer my question.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I will now yield to the gentleman. Mr. WEEKS. Is the gentleman going to include in his remarks the letter that he wrote the First Assistant Postmaster General and the Assistant Postmaster General's reply?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Yes; I am. I am going to be perfectly fair with you people [laughter], and you will know it when I get through.

Mr. WEEKS. There are some of us people who are very glad to find out where the gentleman from New York belongs.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I have not been at all delicate in stating where I belong in this House. I have stood in the middle of the floor here several times and voted as I thought was right, whether it was with the standpats on this side or gentlemen on that side, whoever they may have been. I am down here to cast a decent, honest vote when I think a bill is fair and decent, and I am not going to vote otherwise. I promised my people that I would not be coerced or intimidated from my purpose, from what I thought was right. [Applause.] If this hurts you people I can not help it, because it Furthermore, I wish to call attention to the letter from Lucius N. Littauer of March 6, in which he speaks of changing the village name back to Fort Johnson; from "personal knowledge of the people living in this hamlet" he wishes to assure the Postmaster General that "if he gave his consent there would be practically a unanimous vote for the adoption of the name of Fort Johnson." Now, I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that out of nearly 200 votes in the village of Akin only 34 votes were cast in favor of changing the name of this village, the balance of Fort Johnson." the voters staying at home or being at work and unable to vote, as the election was held in the afternoon and not in the evening, when the voters could get out to vote.

Although I understand that Mr. Littauer has been made a delegate to Chicago to the national convention as a Roosevelt delegate, knowing him as well as I do, I think he will simply go there as a delegate for the purpose of seeing how much he can get, and not in the interests of the people of that district. This man, Littauer, has done more to debauch the voters of my district than any man who has ever been in my district in politics during my lifetime in that section.

Now, gentlemen, that is all I have got in here; there is no more harangue in this thing after this.

Mr. WEEKS. I am glad the gentleman recognizes the stuff that he has been reading.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I have sat here hour after hour and listened to nothing but harangue on that side. tleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who talked a few minutes ago on the Post Office bill, uttered nothing but a harangue. [Laughter.] We might as well all get in together on this [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from New York had listened to the gentleman from Illinois who spoke last he would have got some information which would have done him good.

Mr. AKIN of New York. The gentleman from Illinois got up and made a statement that they wanted a commission appointed so as to get all this information; that he did not know anything about it. I made up my mind that the man who was talking without any information did not know what he was talking about. [Laughter and applause.]

These letters, memoranda, and data simply go to show that the conditions as represented in my former speech were true, and that this deplorable condition does exist in the district which I represent. I did not deem the matter of the changing of the name of enough importance to leave my duties here in Congress to go home and take any action in the matter whatever. If the people of my town wish to live in a village named after a man who, without doubt, as is shown by the documentary history and the colonial history of the State of New York, had no better reputation than the Indian trader of 40 years ago-this Sir William Johnson dealt largely with the Mohawks and Iroquois, as well as the Hurons and Senecas, maintained an elaborate establishment, and made no bones of debauching the Indians of both sexes at this old place; was instrumental in egging on Chief Hendricks in his massacres of the Indians along Lake Champlain, and carried on warfare unparalleled in atrocity all the way north to Quebec—then it is their affair. Now, if under these circumstances, the people care or are inclined to perpetuate the name of this old monster, I shall be perfectly satisfied to bow to the will of the majority.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. How long has that post office been called Akin?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Ever since 1873.

Mr. COOPER. After whom was it named?
Mr. AKIN of New York. My father. Now, to show you, he owned 185 acres of land in this old farm. There was not a house except the old home on it, and by reason of his activity and his business management we have now on that farm a village of 700 people, and it was in honor of him that a former Member of Congress, Mr. John H. Starin, thought it was due him as an old friend to name the post office after him instead of calling it Fort Johnson. He had the same feeling toward this old Sir William Johnson that every other decent man in that neighborhood had. They all knew that he was an old debauchee-an old rake.

In one of the letters to the Postmaster General, written by this young man by the name of Kline, he lays great stress on retaining the name of Fort Johnson, saying that it had been called Fort Johnson from colonial times until the present time. If this smart young man would get the documentary history of New York he would see that it was called Mount Johnson and not Fort Johnson. Moreover, I have lived in this same colonial mansion myself since I was a little boy 3 years old up to a short time ago, and during that time it was never known by any other name than "The Old Fort."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. AKIN of New York. But there is a matter of history, not of colonial days, that perhaps may be uppermost in the memory of A. W. Kline's mind, and that is the records of the Akin schoolhouse and what became of the school moneys, and the partial recovery of the same by the committee appointed to collect the same, all of which he failed to notify the Post Office Department, was a matter of vital interest and history to the taxpayers of the village of Akin.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing else left but letters and data, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman? Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, as I have yielded the gentleman more time and he has not used it all, I would like to have him state what the letters are, to whom they were written, and by whom.

Mr. AKIN of New York. One letter is written to Mr. Burton Harrison, a Member of Congress, by this secretary. There are some newspaper clippings. I do not think that is very fair, I am here the same as any other man. I have told you there is nothing in there but newspaper clippings and the reports of inspectors

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letters and papers referred to are as follows:

AMSTERDAM, N. Y., March 7, 1911.

Amsterdam, N. Y., March 7, 1911.

Hon. Francis Burton Harrison,
Representative in Congress, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: In view of the fact that President Taft has called an extra session of Congress, I am writing to ascertain if there would be any possibility of my securing a session job as a clerk to one of the committees in the new Congress.

While in Washington some few weeks ago I had the pleasure of meeting you with Congressman Akin, from the twenty-fifth district.

I am to be in Washington with Mr. Akin as his secretary, and would like to secure a committee appointment if possible. I do not believe that anyone can question my democracy, and if northern New York is entitled to any consideration in the matter of an appointment of this nature, I would like very much to have my name considered.

While I do not pose as the mouthpiece of the Congressman from the twenty-fifth district, and although one vote may not be of any value, still, nevertheless, in case of a pinch I would be in a position to help the Democrats out in case the one vote might be needed.

Thanking you in advance for anything you may do for me, I am, Very truly, yours,

W. Arthur Kline.

[From the Amsterdam (N. Y.) Sentinel, Mar. 11, 1912.]

The village elections in this vicinity passed off very quietly, there being but few contests. Perhaps most interest centered in the efforts of the opponents of Congressman AKIN to have the name of that village changed from AKIN back to Fort Johnson. In this they were successful. AKIN ELECTION.

The village of Akin by a vote of 34 to 8 has decided to change the name to Fort Johnson, some of the residents of the village taking advantage of the absence of Congressman Akin and thinking to annoy him by submitting the proposition to a vote. The dector didn't look upon the contest as of sufficient interest to leave his post in Washington to come home and vote. The little village has gained some fame through its prosperity as well as through its prosperity as well as through its prosperity as well as through its present president, Congressman Akin. But Ethan Akin, for whom the village was named, appealed to Grover Cleveland, at that time President of the United States, and a quietus was placed upon the new name so far as the post office was concerned. Both Fonda, Johnstown & Gloversville and Central-Hudson Railroad stations will continue to be known by the name Akin. Congressman Akin is understood to have declared the proceeding a piece of small politics, but he will undoubtedly pay his compliments to Postmaster General Hitchcock, whose sanction was given to the proposition to change the name, before the expiration of his term in Congress, which will not be until March 4, 1913.

[From the Amsterdam Recorder, Mar. 20, 1912.] AKIN SAYS HE DOESN'T CARE.

AKIN SAYS HE DOESN'T CARE.

A dispatch from Washington to the New York World says:

"They can change the name to anything they please and I will not lose any sleep over it," Representative Theron Akin said when he read that there is a movement on foot to change the name of the town in which he lives and which was named after his father.

"This town, which was nothing more than a post office, was named after my father 30 years ago," continued Mr. Akin. "It has grown until it has a population of about 700. If my political enemies hope to make any capital out of this thing they can go ahead. I think it's pretty small politics, but I shall do nothing to interfere with their activities. I can live there just as comfortably and just as happily, no matter what name they call it by."

[From the Amsterdam Recorder, April, 1912.]

Another episode which, it is said, has detracted from the popularity of Representative Akin was the institution by him of an action against Arthur Kline, of Amsterdam, formerly his private secretary, whom he accused of slandering him by means of postal cards. The action was brought before Judge Ray, in the United States court, and the impression is that it will not be pressed.

Mr. Akin's speech was "extended" in the Record under "leave to print." Here is a paragraph from the speech:

"It appears, Mr. Speaker, that the reason given why Mr. Taff failed to make his promise good to me in regard to the appointment of honest men for postmasters in my district was made public by a pinhead reporter in a spineless paper which is printed in my district, and I am well informed that the parties who imparted this information about my not being good and not being able to trust me were Lucius N. Littauer and one Cyrus Durey.

Inspector in Charge, New York, N. Y.

Sir: I have the honor to submit report in the matter of the mailing at Amsterdam, N. Y., on September 8, 9, 14, and 20, 1911, of scurrilous postal cards addressed to the Hon. Theron Akin, Member of Congress from the twenty-fifth New York district, in violation of section 498 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, edition of 1902.

This case was given attention at Amsterdam, N. Y., last September, in accordance with instruction from you under date of September 18, addressed to me at Ticonderoga, N. Y., following personal complaint to you by Representative Akin.

The objectionable postal cards, 84 in number, were addressed and delivered to complainant at Akin, N. Y. None have been mailed or received since September 20. Complainant accused W. Arthur Kline, a young attorney of Amsterdam, N. Y., who was formerly his secretary, with having written and mailed and with having caused same to be written and mailed. He is very familiar with Kline's handwriting, recognizes the writing on some of the cards as his, and can and did swear to that fact. A comparison of the handwriting on the cards, where same have been written by Kline as alleged by complainant, with Kline's handwriting to be found on the records of the village of Akin. N. Y., kept by him while clerk of the village prior to his employment as the Congressman's secretary, apparently warrants the charge that Kline wrote some of the cards. Although the writing on the cards in question is disguised, yet there is a strong similarity, in many instances, to Kline's known chirography. A noticeable peculiarity of Kline's infinishing a sentence, is to use a colon and a dash instead of a period. This peculiarity is noticed in many instances on the scurrilous cards, whether they have been prepared by hand or on the typewriter, as many were; but under the rules of procedure in the United States court the village records of Akin and other samples of Kline's handwriting, which had no bearing on the matter at issue, could no

The clerks in the Amsterdam office who handled them take refuge in the statement that they supposed the unmailability of post cards de-pended only on their obscenity or suggestiveness. The clerks and the postmaster pleaded ignorance of the regulations as applied to scurrilous postmaster pleaded ignorance of the regulations as applied to scattled matter.

The facts in the case were submitted to the United States attorney. For the northern district of New York, at Binghamton, September 23 last, and the case was submitted to the grand jury at an adjourned term of the court which convened at Utica, N. Y., on the 16th instant. It failed to return a bill, and this action is final.

Mr. Akin desires that the cards be returned to him. The United States attorney has no objection to their return to him. Other papers submitted by complainant are in the United States attorney's files and can be secured from him direct if desired.

I recommend the return of the post and postal cards, which are fransmitted with this report to Representative Akin in accordance with his request, and that the case be closed.

Very respectfully,

George W. Daily,

Post Office Inspector.

My Dear Mr. Littauer: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, with reference to changing the name of the village of Akin, Montgomery County, N. Y., to Fort Johnson, and to inform you that, so far as the department is concerned, there appears to be no objection to changing the name of the post office at that place to Fort Johnson, and I have therefore given my formal consent to the change of name of the village in accordance with the provision of the laws of the State of New York.

MY DEAR MR. HITCHCOCK: You will have received a paper from the members of the village of Akin, Montgomery County, N. From personal knowledge of people living in this hamlet, I can assure you that, if your consent is given, there will be practically a unanimous vote for the adoption of the name Fort Johnson, and I would be particularly gratified if you could see fit to gratify this request.

There appears to be no objection so far as the department is concerned to changing the name of the post office to Fort Johnson, and I therefore give my formal consent to the change of the name of the village, in accordance with the provision of the laws of the State of New York referred to in your letter.

Hon. Frank H. Hitchcock,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: On February 20 I directed a letter to you of which the inclosed is a copy. Having received no reply or acknowledgment of the same I have concluded that the same failed to reach your office. For the past month there has been a series of robberies at the Amsterdam post office—a great deal of first-class mail had been stolen. The thief when apprehended confessed to stealing a great many letters and destroying the same after ascertaining that they contained nothing of value. Laboring under the impression that the letter of mine might have been thus destroyed and wishing to be on the safe side I am inclosing copy of same as above indicated.

February 20, 1912.

Hon. Frank H. Hitchcock,

Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: At a meeting of the trustees of the village of Akin, N. Y., held on the 19th day of February, 1912, the following resolution was adopted:

By Trustee Charles Wood:

"Resolved, That at the annual election to be held on the 19th day of March, 1912, the following proposition be submitted to the electors of the village to be voted upon:

"Shall the name of the village of Akin, N. Y., be changed from Akin to Fort Johnson?"

Carried. All voting "Aye."

Under the provisions of section 347 of the village law, as found in the Consolidated Laws of the State of New York, before this question can be officially placed upon the ballot at the annual election it is necessary that the written consent of the Postmaster General of the United States accompany the same.

I am therefore requested to present this matter to you for your consideration. As you are probably aware, within the boundaries of this village is situated the old colonial fort built and occupied as a residence by Sir William Johnson during his term of office as commissioner of Indian affairs, just prior to the Revolution. This fort is now the property of the Montgomery County Historical Society, and the residence of the village are desirous of changing the name for the purpose of handing down to the future generations the old colonial name of the village.

As you will note from the resolution as adopted, the village election will be held on the 19th of March, 1912, and in order to vote upon this question it will be necessary for the consent to change from your office shall be in my hands, as village clerk, during the first week of March, so that the ballots may be properly prepared.

Trusting that you may see your way clear to grant this request upon the part of the village trustees, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. Arthur Kline, Village Clerk.

MARCH 8, 1012.

Honorable First Assistant Postmaster General.

Post Office Department, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: Notice comes to me that there is a project on foot to change the name of the post office at Akin, N. Y., to the name of Fort Johnson. Have you issued an order to change the name of that post office to that of Fort Johnson, and has there been any correspondence as to the change of the name, and who is the instigator of the project? Yours, respectfully.

THERON AKIN.

MARCH 12, 1912.

Hon. Theron Akin,

House of Representatives.

My Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, requesting information as to whether a change in the name of the post office at Akin, Montgomery County, N. Y., to Fort Johnson has been ordered. In reply, I beg to say that the department was officially informed that at a meeting of the board of trustees of the village of Akin it was decided to submit to a vote of the electors the question as to whether the name of the village should be changed to Fort Johnson, and that under the laws of the State of New York it was necessary, before the question could be officially placed upon the ballot, that the written consent of the Postmaster General be given. As there appeared to be no objection, so far as the department was concerned, to changing the name of the post office to Fort Johnson, in the event of the change of name of the village, the formal consent of the Postmaster General was given to the proposed change.

Very truly, yours,

C. P. Grandfield,

C. P. GRANDFIELD, First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Redfield]. [Applause.]

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to acknowledge the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] who has kindly yielded that I may speak at this particular moment, having engagements later in the day. As an Irish friend of mine said, I want to say before I commence that I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] in his regret that this bill does not yet provide for the promotion and advancement of the laborers employed in the Post Office Department. I hope it will ultimately come so to do, and I shall be glad to join with anyone who will bring that about. I think it is the duty of the United States Government to be a model employer, and that it should open the door of opportunity to its humblest servants as well as to those higher in its service.

I am sure also that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] left unsaid one-half of what he had in mind when he spoke of the effect of the conditions of department-store employment and wages upon the young women in those stores. The other half I am sure he meant to say, and for him and in his behalf I want to say it in a moment or two now. I personally know four great department stores, one in Philadelphia, one in New York, one in Brooklyn, and one in Boston, the proprietors of which strain every nerve for the care of their working girls. On the minds of these men the rate of wages and the uplift of those girls is a moral charge. It never leaves their thought. One of them said to me one day: "Mr. Redfield, I would like to advance my 6,000 girls 50 cents a week, but I do not know now where the $156,000 per year that that would cost is to come from." But by opportunity for promotion, and in every But by opportunity for promotion, and in every way he could do it, he strove to uplift those girls. And in like manner I know men in other cities who have esteemed it a privilege and a duty to strive to carry out the uplift of their employees to the full.

I want to speak, however, this afternoon upon section 5 of this bill, which has relation to the hours of work of the letter carriers, and to place before the committee certain facts collected by a subcommittee, of which I was chairman, a few weeks ago in the investigation of the post office at Brooklyn, N. Y., and which has not heretofore been made public. They have not yet appeared in the report of the subcommittee, because the matter was so large it has not been possible to get that report prepared, but they should be before the House in the discussion of this bill, which is directly affected by them. There are three distinct matters of which I wish to speak which affect the letter-carrier force in our great post offices. These are the matter of hours, the matter of the speed or the nervous tension under which the men work, and the matter of the weight those men carry, and on two of these matters I have before me official information coming from the department itself and acknowledged to be correct by the men themselves. I will first take up the question of hours, then, briefly, to which section 5 refers. I have in my hand the time cards of certain of the force in the general post office and in four stations in the city of Brooklyn during the latter part of February, 1912, and I read briefly from these cards, as it would be difficult to insert them in the RECORD without reading because of their peculiar form. I find the following facts relating to what are known as the "long tours" on the alternate weeks: One week these men work the straight eight hours. Their partners the following week work eight hours, and the man who this week works eight hours next week works what is called the "long tour." This results that on the 24th of February Mr. Paul A. Graw, attached to Station B of the Brooklyn post office, reported for duty at 5.45 a. m. and left duty finally for the night at 7.09 p. m. There is, of course, as you know, what is known as the midday "swing." That is, he actually worked from 5.45 in the morning until 9.57, when he gets a swing, and he reported again for duty at 3.15, and left at 7.09 p. m., or 8 hours and 6 minutes work, distributed, as you see, over a period of 131

The next day the same carrier's time was from 5.45 a, m, to 7.13 p. m.; the next day from 5.45 to 7.10; the next day was a holiday; and again on Friday of that week his time was from 5.45 to 7.17, and he completed the week by working on Saturday from 5.45 until 7 o'clock, in each case with the midday swing of which I have spoken. In the same station, Robert C. Green, jr., on the same day (Feb. 24, 1912) worked from 5.45 a. m. to 7.15 p. m.; the following day the same hours; the following day from 5.45 to 7.10; the following day was a holiday; and then on the next day he worked from 5.45 to 7, and on Saturday from 5.45 to 7.15. Thus I might read the whole of the cards for that station which gives all the details. I will turn now to Station S in another portion of the city, and I find Thomas J. McManus working on the 24th of February from 5.30 in the morning until 6.25 in the evening, with a swing from 9.40 to 2.15. On Tuesday he worked from 5.50 to 6.20 in the evening; on Wednesday from 5.50 to 6.25; on Thursday it was a holf-day; on Friday he worked from 5.50 to 6.35; and on Saturday from 5.50 to 6.20, all with a swing in the middle of the day. This statement may be said to be typical of that station also. Now, referring to the general post office

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly, with pleasure.
Mr. WEEKS. I take it this is a residence section served by these carriers, is it not?

Mr. REDFIELD. Not altogether; one is and the other is mixed. The cards which I now hold in my hand are strictly a business section, and I brought these cards as representing two portions of the city in order that we might fairly cover the entire city. Now, in regard to the cards for the general post office, which is almost wholly a business section, I find that February 24 one Thomas C. Smith worked on Monday from 5.30 in the morning to 7.10 in the evening; on Tuesday from 5.45 to 7.10; on Wednesday from 5.45 to 7; Thursday being a holiday

I find George J. McNamara working from 5.30 in the morning of Monday, the 24th of February, to 5.58 in the evening; Tuesday, from 5.45 in the morning to 6 o'clock in the evening; and so on in similar proportion in the general post office.

Referring, now, briefly to Station W, in the same post office,
I find John J. O'Neil, on the same day of February, working from 5.45 in the morning to 7.12 in the evening-this being extreme hours-with the swing in the middle of the day. On the 26th of February O'Neil worked from 6 a. m. to 7.17 p. m. I have other cards showing a similar record from the same station. And, finally, referring to the Flatbush Station, almost purely a residence station and the one in which I myself live, find James M. Ball, on the 24th of February, working from 5.45 in the morning to 5.45 in the evening, and on Tuesday, February 25, from 6 in the morning until 5.45 in the evening, again with the swing in the middle of the day, and on Wednesday from 6 o'clock in the morning until 5.40 in the evening. They worked in this station rather shorter hours, because it is more purely a residence district.

I will not read more cards, because they will be made a part of the committee's report, and any Member can see them.

That long service lasts for a week, and the length of the "swing" between the early and the late tour depends on the time when the carrier gets back from his morning service.

Mr. COOPER. What was the earliest hour at which any of them went to work, as you remember?

Mr. REDFIELD. Five-thirty.
Mr. COOPER. And that is understood as meaning that a man has to get up about 4.30 in the morning and get his break-

Mr. REDFIELD. I am glad the gentleman asked the ques-I asked witnesses under oath as to how these men got their breakfast, and was told they could not, of course, disturb their wives and children. They got up themselves at from 4.30 to 4.45, prepared their own simple breakfast, and got away from the house at 5 o'clock.

Mr. COOPER. And then they get home at half past 8 or 9 o'clock at night?

Mr. REDFIELD. I do not desire in any way to mislead the House as to the fact that these men in a given day of 24 hours do no more than 8 hours or within a few minutes of 8 hours' work. But each man during these broken days feels very keenly the consciousness that he has got to be back on his work, so to speak, and his mind must be upon it from 5 o'clock in the morning until 7 o'clock in the evening. And if there has been a heavy storm which has interrupted the traffic, I need not explain to this House the situation in which that man finds himself.

So much for what I may call the negative side of the case. The facts are admitted, because these cards were given me by authority of the post office. On the other hand, the question was asked, as a part of our committee investigation, How a change of hours would work? And I thought it was fair to have these facts under oath in order to pave the way somewhat for this discussion. The president of the local Letter Carriers' Association stated that it would be perfectly possible to arrange a schedule so that an 8-hour day within 10 hours' continuous time could be laid out without serious additional expense to the Government and without interruption to the work. And in that connection he pointed out what every business man knows to be true, that a late evening delivery for a business house is rarely of any great value, for any delivery in a down-town business district after 5 o'clock is practically worthless for use that day.

He was asked this more closely—the president of the Letter Carriers' Association in the Brooklyn post office was askedif he would cause to be prepared a schedule based upon the 8 hours in 10, and did so. I received it only a few days ago. It forms a portion of the subcommittee's report, and it is here now in my hand and is available for examination by any member of the Post Office Committee or anybody who desires to see it, and fully works out any kind of tour-two trips, three trips, four trips, five trips, and six-trip routes-all of them based upon continuous 8 hours' work, and all of them showing adjustment to the necessary convenience alike of the business and the residential districts of the city.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Has that routine, as arranged with the president of the Letter Carriers' Association, been submitted to the postmaster at New York?

Mr. REDFIELD. No; and the gentleman's question, if he will pardon me, shows that he was a little misled. This was the post office at Brooklyn.

Mr. WEEKS. I supposed the post office at Brooklyn was connected with the New York post office.

Mr. REDFIELD. No.

Mr. WEEKS. Has it been submitted to the postmaster at

Mr. REDFIELD. No; except that the question was asked in his presence and in the presence of his deputies whether such a one could be prepared, and it was prepared by a man in whom he has expressed confidence.

Mr. WEEKS. Did he agree that it was a practical arrange-

Mr. REDFIELD. As yet I can not say as to that of my own knowledge.

Mr. UTTER Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly. Mr. UTTER. Were these long carries, which the gentleman has reported, in the business section or in the residential sec-

Mr. REDFIELD. They were in both. They cover substantially typical areas—six of them—all over the city.

Now, as to the question of hours, it is my judgment, Mr. Chairman-after examining that post office for several days and making careful inquiry of the carriers in several of the stations—that the question of hours presented by this bill involves no more than an ordinary business adjustment, and would do justice to the men who are fairly, in all righteousness, entitled to it.

Now, I want to take up for a few moments another phase of this same subject. What do these men have to carry in the way of weights? We had before us, under examination, the superintendent of mails, who is in charge of the 1,100 and more carriers who operate in that post office. The committee requested each one of three stations and the general post office to prepare slips showing the largest weight taken out by any carrier during this investigation on certain days, which we fixed without the authorities knowing what they were to be in ad-These slips were to be signed by the carrier himself and by the superintendent of the station, so that there could be no question as to whether they told the truth or not.

I hold in my hand the slips representing the general post office and Stations B, S, and W, on the 1st and 2d of March, and, referring to those, I will read very briefly certain questions addressed by me to the superintendent of mail delivery in Brooklyn and his answers. And in saying this I do it with-out any thought, expressed or in my mind, of criticism of the officers of the post office. That is not at all my purpose. I simply am desiring to make a public record of facts which relate to the bill now under discussion. I read:

Mr. Redfield. What do you consider the maximum amount of mail a carrier can handle on one delivery trip?

Mr. Carrougher. Why, on the three-trip route he should carry 40 a carrier can handle on one delivery trip?

Mr. Carrougher. Why, on the three-trip route he should carry 40 pounds of mail.

Mr. Redfield. Do you know what the average load was that was taken out of the general post office in Brooklyn this morning?

Mr. Carrougher. I have an idea, but did not look at the figures, as I did not think you would want me to; but I have an idea that they would average about 60 pounds per man.

Mr. Redfield. Do the initialed tickets which have been handed by you to me, and which I show you, represent the loads taken out by the carriers this morning in the Brooklyn office?

Mr. Carrougher. Yes, sir.

Mr. Redfield. I call your attention to the fact that the tabulation made by Judge Towner from the slips shows the smallest load taken out this morning to be 52 pounds, and largest 81 pounds, or an average for 20 carriers of 65 pounds mail. To-day was not a day on which any of the large publications had to be delivered. What would you say was the heaviest load a carrier would be obliged to take out at one time?

Mr. Carrougher. That is a very problematical question. A week ago Tuesday I weighed the mail on route 12, of which you have the corresponding weight, and he took out 112 pounds.

Mr. Redfield. Would it be unusual for a carrier to take out as many as 40 copies of the Ladles' Home Journal or a publication of corresponding weight on one trip?

Mr. Carrougher. That would be possible on several routes; not more than 10 in the whole office.

Mr. Redfield. And on those 10 routes that would mean an added load of approximately 40 pounds, would it not?

Mr. Carrougher. About that.

Mr. Redfield. So that if that route happened to be the one upon which these tickets which you have furnished showed a weight of 52 pounds a day, that load might become 90 pounds?

Mr. Carrougher. Yes.

It is hardly necessary for me to go through these tickets in detail, because the substance of them has appeared in the extracts from the testimony which I have read to you; but I hope that it may be possible to incorporate in this legislation a provision that a letter carrier shall not be required to take out at any one time over 75 pounds of mail. I think if it be considered that he must go in the stress of weather, without regard to what the conditions are, and that he must go on schedule time both as to his start and as to his return, 75 pounds of mail is all that a man should be expected to carry under such circumstances.

Finally, this that I shall speak about is a matter of individual judgment. It must be taken as meaning no more than that. I have been accustomed all my life to shops in which men working in considerable numbers have been employed. One gets a certain habit of knowing whether the men are overexerting themselves or not. It was my judgment, from visiting two of these stations at a time when work was progressing most rapidly, one of them the general post office, that these men were under high tension. In examining not 1 nor 2 nor 10, but more, that impression became very real to me, and upon inquiring of 3 of the carriers under oath as to that matter, they confirmed it, and their statements will appear in the record of the committee.

We have, then, a situation of this kind, that half the time in which those men are employed they are employed at hours which in their extremes may be said to be unusual and ex-Then they are occasionally obliged-I do not say cessive. often-I do not know how often-to carry what seems to me to be excessive loads, and that they are daily obliged to work under what seems to me to be high tension. The nervous speed with which the work must be done is, to my mind, a very real factor in it.

And this must be always borne in mind, that they are not merely like the man who has so much ordinary work to do, but this particular work must be done with a very high percentage of accuracy. Mistakes are not to any considerable extent allowable at all. So that there is here not merely a physical but a mental tension, the tension of a keen mind directed to very accurate work. Under these circumstances, which I have tried to describe as simply as I could and very briefly, I have felt, and feel now, that this legislation, which provides for these carriers working 8 hours in a continuous 10, is in the first place practical legislation, requiring no serious trouble, causing no injury to the service, and occasioning no special difficulty or excessive expense in its establishment and operation. In the next place I feel that it is wise. We have a force of men that is, I think, admirable. The gentleman whose testimony I have read spoke with great pride of his working I believe the force is now somewhat overstrained nervously. I believe it ought to be so adjusted in these details that we may feel that these men are working within and not beyond their powers. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. UTTER. Of course, the purpose of the postal work is the public service. Did the committee take into consideration, from the postmasters' side, the question why they made this arrangement of hours? Of course, nobody believes there was a desire to make hard work, but it is a question of the public What did the postmaster say with reference to that?

Mr. REDFIELD. The man from whose testimony in part I have read was the superintendent of mails, the man next to the postmaster in that department. The testimony is quite voluminous. The arrangement I have read I have not read because it was exceptional, but because it was typical of the entire department in the large offices. These are in general, with a few minor exceptions, the usual conditions that prevail in the large offices. I want the gentleman from Rhode Island to understand that I am not holding any particular officer or officers accountable for the conditions. I think they have gradually grown up.
Mr. UTTER. I have not intended to imply that there was any intention on the part of the gentleman from New York except to state fairly the facts. Will the gentleman state what the postmaster gave as a reason for recommending these hours? I understand that the postal carriers can only work eight hours in a day. Now, why is it? Has the public convenience made it necessary for the postmaster to make such an arrangement?

Mr. REDFIELD. In order, I believe, to get the largest amount of service at the least possible cost. I think they have, without meaning to do so, unconsciously "taken it out of" the men; and, if I may proceed a moment, there has been in particular post offices—and it was that fact which led to the inquiry—a very considerable reduction in the carrier force, with the result of throwing a larger amount of work on the men that remained.

Mr. UTTER. The conclusion of the committee naturally would be that in order to give the men 8 hours' labor within 10 hours it would be necessary to increase the force.

Mr. REDFIELD. I think it may not be. I think it may be accomplished by a readjustment, and I think the schedules which will appear in the report will show that fact.

Mr. UTTER. It is a practical question which can be deter-

Mr. REDFIELD. It is a practical question.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island stated, in asking his question of the gentleman from New York, that the law now was that carriers should not work more than eight hours a day. That is not correct. It is 48 hours a week. They may work 10 hours to-day and 6 hours to-morrow.

Mr. REDFIELD. As a matter of fact, these cards are arranged for that very purpose in columns, which carry them over from day to day, the aggregate number of hours showing on a weekly basis instead of a daily basis.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. In the gentleman's investigation he has detailed for long hours for men, did he discover from that examination any physical or mental effects that the long-hour service had upon the employees?

Mr. REDFIELD. I must admit, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, that I have not sufficient medical experience to be able to speak on the subject. We did examine three or four carriers in station B, who said that they were under a nervous strain and felt it. I think it is entirely reasonable to add that I think in the situation that the men work under at their desks preparing for the ringing of the bell—and the man who works toward the ringing of a bell is always under a strain—that these men standing at the desk and working with intensity, accuracy, and speed were under a certain amount of strain. I do not desire to exaggerate it, but I think it was really a strain.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Steenerson] a member of the committee.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the House and the country on the fact that for the first time in many years we have arrived at a point where the postal department is, at least, on a self-sustaining basis. There is a dispute between the Postmaster General and the chairman of the Post Office Committee whether there is a small surplus or a small deficit, but that is of very little importance. If we take into consideration the fact that the postal service carries all of the congressional mail and all the departmental mail from which, if it bore postage like other mail, we would receive a revenue annually of four or five million dollars, there is really a profit from the service.

Another thing that challenges our attention is the fact of the rapid growth of the postal business. Ten years ago the appropriations were $123,000,000. This bill carries $259,827,749, an increase of more than 100 per cent.

The increase is not only in the appropriations, but in the expenditures, at about the same ratio. The expenditures have exceeded the appropriations in every year except the last. The increase in population in the last decade was something like 20 per cent, whereas the increase in the expenditures for the postal service was more than 100 per cent. We are an industrial and commercial people, and the increase in the amount of our commerce is indicated by the increase in the per capita expenditure. There is a greater exchange of commodities, a greater diversity of industry, than there ever was before, and this necessitated an increased volume of commerce. The postal service is a good index to the progress and prosperity of the people. It may be a disputed question whether or not a postal deficit is a blessing or an evil.

When I first came to Congress nine years ago there was a postal deficit, and there had been quite a deficit for several years prior to that time. It had created considerable attention in Congress. In 1900 or in 1901 a commission was appointed by authority of an act of Congress, known as the Wolcott Commission, to investigate the postal deficit and the cause thereof. That investigation inquired chiefly into the cost of carrying mail by railways, it being alleged that the prices paid by the United States for railway mail transportation were excessive.

After deliberating and after investigating for a couple of years a report was made by the majority that railway mail pay was not excessive, and by a minority it was. One of these minority reports was made by Mr. Moody, who was afterwards Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He pointed out the fact that the cost of carrying the mail by railway depended upon the size of the load carried on each car, and that where mail was carried in railway mail cars weighing perhaps 100,000 pounds, furnishing the accommodations of a traveling post office for several clerks, and carrying only two or three thousand pounds of mail, it necessarily involved an expense very much greater than if it was loaded with 4 or 5 tons or 6 tons, or, as sometimes happens in a storage car, with 20 tons. This investigation of railway mail pay resulted in no particular legislation by the next Congress, but the question came up in the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, and Sixtieth Congresses. We passed several acts reducing the railway mail pay on the heavy routes, where the average daily weight exceeded 5,000 pounds, and again we passed one that reduced the pay where a daily average exceeded 48,000 pounds, and we also made a horizontal reduction of 5 or 10 per cent. That seemed to satisfy the congressional mind for a time; but on the advent of the present Postmaster General the question arose indirectly in the discussion of second-class postage rates, which he contended involved a loss to the Government for the year 1909, I believe it was, of $70,000,000. This was due to the fact that the rate per pound paid by the Government to the railways exceeded the postage received. The difference was so large that it exceeded by many times the amount of postage at 1 cent a pound collected from the publishers.

Congress, in order to solve this second-class postage problem, created a commission of inquiry, the so-called Overstreet commission. The department had extensive special mail weighings throughout the United States, a count of pieces, and an estimate of the distance that each piece or parcel was carried, After this commission had investigated the matter a year or so it found it could not complete its work, and so Congress gave it more time and also gave it authority to employ experts. The best accountants that money could hire were employed. They went to work and investigated the whole question of the cost of transportation of mail. An extensive report was made, embracing evidence covering thousands of pages, which, I venture to say, very few Members of Congress ever read.

We come down now to a year ago. The evidence was absolutely undisputed that the Government was carrying secondclass mail matter at a loss. How large a loss was perhaps in dispute, but it was a very heavy loss, more than twice as much as was paid for the carriage by the publishers. The Postmaster General urged, in view of the testimony, a change, but the committee did not report any legislation. There was a bill pending, I believe, that failed to be reported for want of time in a short session of the Sixty-first Congress, which did not provide for higher rates; but when the appropriation bill came over to the Senate the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads agreed upon an amendment raising the pay for second-class matter from 1 cent to 4 cents a pound.

That naturally excited the publishers, and a delegation of them came to Washington and had a conference at the White House. They claimed they had not had sufficient opportunity to show their side of the question; that these investigations had been one-sided; and they appealed to the President for an opportunity to show the facts. Of course I am stating I was not present. I do not know this simply on hearsay. what took place, but that was the general talk in the newspapers and outside. They claimed that if they had an opportunity to present the matter fully and impartially to an impartial commission for a decision they would be glad to abide by the result. The result of that conference was that the Senate agreed upon a provision for a commission, which was inserted in the appropriation bill. One of the commissioners, it was provided, should be a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. When that came to the House the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon], the ranking Democratic minority member on the Post Office Committee at that time, objected to having that provision in the appropriation bill, and it was finally arranged that it should pass as an independent resolution, and so the so-called Hughes Commission to investigate second-class mail matter was created. That commission went into the subject most extensively, and the Postmaster General, in his report of 1911, refers to the fact that this commission had been appointed and it had not yet reported when his annual report was made. He said:

made. He said:

The controversy over the department's recommendations on this subject had the desired effect of directing popular attention to the second-class mail problem, and the final outcome was the adoption by Congress of a joint resolution creating a commission to investigate the subject and make report. Extensive hearings were held by the commission during the summer, at which the officers of the department presented data in support of their contention as to the great loss incurred in handling second-class mail and submitted recommendations for a gradual equalization of postage rates on the basis of cost. As the first step in that direction the department suggested that the postage rate on second-class mail be increased I cent a pound, thus making a flat rate of 2 cents a pound, which charge should be regarded as merely tentative, however, leaving for future determination such additional increase as may be found necessary to meet the cost. It is hoped that the commission will look with favor on this recommendation and that legislation providing for its adoption will be enacted by Congress.

This is in the report of the Postmaster General. Now, the

This is in the report of the Postmaster General. Now, the President sent a message here on the 22d day of February transmitting the findings of the Hughes commission, in which they found that the cost of second-class mail was more than 5 cents a pound. They do not recommend as high a rate of postage as that; they recognize the revolution that it would create, and therefore they contented themselves with recommending an increase to 2 cents a pound, and the President in his message to Congress said, and I quote from the message:

The commission suggests that the department "maintain an adequate cost system, so that the effect of the new rates may be closely observed and a proper basis may be secured for the consideration of any future proposals."

and a proper basis may be secured for the consideration of any future proposals."

In these recommendations the Postmaster General and I heartily concur and commend them to the early attention of Congress. The proposed increase of 1 cent a pound in the second-class postage rate I believe to be most reasonable, and if sufficient time is allowed before the change goes into effect it should work little serious injury to the business of the periodical publishers, while equalizing, at least in measure, the burdens of postal taxation.

All these investigations have cost this Government at least a quarter of a million dollars, and yet this bill, although it carries all sorts of new legislation, is silent on the question of secondclass rates. It carries more new legislation than any appropriation bill I have ever known, and yet it omits the most important subject of new legislation, the most important matter so far as magnitude is concerned. I understand a year ago when our friends on the other side were in the minority that they favored an increase in second-class rates, but now that they are in the majority they are silent on the subject. [Applause on the Republican side.] Can it be that they pay any attention to the mighty influence of the newspapers? Why, bless your souls, no; they would not pay any attention to the influence of the newspapers and the magazines. [Laughter on the Republican

The fact that there is a presidential election coming on certainly can have nothing to do with that omission. It must be simply a lapsus that can not be accounted for in any manner. But they do recommend postal rate changes, not on the subject that has been the burning question for all these years, which the Government has spent a quarter of a million dollars in investigating, but they propose rural parcel post and general parcel post. They propose here in this bill to change the rate for parcels and merchandise and to investigate the subject afterwards. How did it happen that this horse was hitched behind the wagon? Here we have investigated one subject for five years and forgot to follow it up with proper legislation, but on another subject we legislate in advance of an investigation. Why should there be such a difference between the parcel post and second-class mail matter? I am simply throwing this out as a suggestion needing some explanation.

Will the gentleman yield to me for a Mr. MONDELL. question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. Mr. MONDELL. Is there no member of the committee present who can answer the gentleman's interrogatory?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I suppose they will in due time.

I was not particularly anxious to have the interrogatory answered now

Mr. MONDELL. I supposed the gentleman was insisting upon an immediate answer.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, if the gentleman from Wyoming desires to come to the rescue of any of the members of the Post Office Committee

Mr. MONDELL. I was not, but I was anxious to know what the answer was.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I supposed the inquiry was a facetious query that did not need an answer.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I would not object to one, but I have no doubt the matter will receive consideration in debate that will follow. I did not necessarily expect to have it discussed in my time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] discussed parcel post from one point of view. The gentleman from Maryland

[Mr. Lewis] asked him some very interesting questions. I have no doubt that it is a fact, as the gentleman from Maryland said, that at 12 cents a pound, or $240 a ton, there will not be very much traffic moved. I think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] is absolutely right in saying that this kind of parcel post will not be effectual in relieving those who desire that accommodation, because it is such a high rate that for ordinary merchandise it will be absolutely prohibitive. It will not move at that rate by mail. Perhaps it might yield a profit.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman suffer an interruption at that point? He was kind enough to refer to me.

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Since that statement I have looked at the statement of the Postmaster General. With regard to the pound it is correct, but with regard to the piece the cost was found to be something less than 4 cents a piece, and the revenue a little over 5 cents a piece.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think, perhaps, that may be correct, but it is not in accordance with my recollection. However, that can be settled later on. It is undoubtedly true that the rate of 12 cents a pound would be compensatory. I think that the right view to take is that we should not, at least, view the matter of parcel post entirely from the standpoint of the proposed patron. I think that it is the duty of Congress to consider it from the point of view of the Government. If we do, I think we will all agree that no parcel-post rate should be fixed that would involve the Government in a loss.

The business of transportation of parcels, or package freight, is not one of the necessary functions of government, but belongs rather to that field which is usually occupied by private enter-No political philosopher has as yet been able to lay down any certain rule to define the boundaries between what may or may not be properly undertaken as a government activity to the exclusion of the citizen. There are theories enough, but in actual practice governments only enter the field of private enterprise when it becomes necessary to protect the public from injustice and extortion. If these can be avoided by strict government regulation, it is wise to do so.

Originally the postal service was simply a service carrying the Government dispatches-intelligence from one Government agency to another—and it gradually took on the carrying of letters for the public. The idea that it should become the transporter of merchandise is a modern idea. The postal service has grown up to satisfy the need for rapid and certain transmission of intelligence by means of letters and newspapers and periodicals. That being the main function, our transportation system has been adapted to it, and it is an expensive one.

I have already alluded to the fact that it has carried small loads on heavy cars; that it has carried them at great speed, at frequent intervals, by rail and by star route. Now, if this had been designed from the beginning as a means for transporting freight, it would have been planned a little differently than it is. And therefore we find that the laws governing compensation to the railway companies, which carry the most of our mail, are based upon an entirely different plan than would have been designed for a concern doing freight business.

The law in regard to compensation of railways for carrying mail is a growth that started 40 or 50 years ago when railroads were young. The railway mail pay is based upon the average number of pounds which passes over each mile of railroad during the year—the average weight per day per year. It is not a fixed rate. It is a sliding scale, varying according to the density of the traffic. A railroad that carries only 200 pounds of mail on an average each day is paid a rate 20 times higher per pound than one that carries over 50,000 pounds.

The compensation paid the railroads for transporting the mails is a certain amount per mile per annum, based on the average weight per day carried over the whole length of the mail route. The average weight is ascertained every four years by special weighings for that purpose, a weighing being had annually in one of the four districts into which the country is divided.

The schedule of rates was fixed by the act of March 3, 1873 (chap. 231, sec. 1, 17 Stat., 558). This was reduced 10 per cent in 1876 (act of July 12, 1876, chap. 179, 19 Stat., 78); and a reduction of 5 per cent was made in 1878 (act of June 17, 1878, chap. 259, 20 Stat., 140). The act of March 2, 1907 (chap. 2513, 34 Stat., 1212), provided for a decrease of rates on routes where the average weight per day was between 5,000 pounds and 48,000 pounds, and on those where it was over 48,000 pounds, respectively. The following was the schedule in force during 1908. It is still in force, save that by the act of May 12, 1910 (chap. 230, 36 Stat., 362), the compensation on land-grant railroads for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds was reduced from $17.10 to $15.39.

Mr. NYE. Have we any report from this commission, or either of these commissions that the gentleman has mentioned, as to whether or not the Government is on the whole paying too much for the transportation of mail by rail?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; we have not. The department has made computations.

Mr. NYE. We have been a long while trying to get it.

Mr. STEENERSON. It will be readily seen that it is a difficult question to arrive at, because of the kind of service that is rendered. You can not estimate it by the pound. It actually costs that railroad that carries only 200 pounds a day a good deal more than they get for it. It is a strange fact. They have gone before the department, these short-line railroads from Long Island and elsewhere, and they have established by undoubted evidence that they carried the mail at a loss, although they received a rate 20 times greater than the rate paid to a road that carried over 48,000 pounds in average daily weight over its route. Here are two saveds enter the form weight over its route. Here are two sample routes taken from the report of the department, one with a dense traffic, and one with a light traffic, and we can see how it works out: Route No. 131002—Pittsburgh to Chicago, Pennsylvania Railroad—this No. 131002—Pittsburgh to Chicago, Pennsylvania Railroad—this route is 468.43 miles long and carries 211,644 pounds average daily weight, 74.68 trips per week, and receives the lowest rate of pay, and yet earns $2,180.61 per mile per year, or a total of $1,021,463.14. Route No. 133034—Rockport to Rockport Junction, Chicago, Indiana & Southern Railroad Co.—this route is 16.55 miles long and carries 274 pounds of mail daily, and makes an average of 12.50 trips per week. The average cost per mile per year is $47.88, or a total of $792.41. Less than a rural carrier would get for only six trips a

We have not been idle in this matter of reducing railway mail The fact is that we have reduced the railway mail nearly pay. The fact is that we have reduced the railway man hearly one-third in the last slx years. I made a computation some time ago. In 1900, out of the total disbursements in the service 31 car pay 21.4 per cent. That is, we decreased the railway-mail pay, if we based it upon the proportion of the total expenditures, about one-third in the 10 years. That is the reason we have per cent was for transportation by rail, and counting pay for railway post-office cars, it was 35 per cent. In 1910, out of total disbursements in the postal service we only spent 10 per cent for transportation by rail and counting railway post-office total disbursements in the postal service we only spent 19 per cent for transportation by rail and counting railway post-office been able to increase the pay of rural and city carriers as well as other postal employees. If last year we had paid at the rate we did 10 years ago we would have paid over seventy millions to the railroads instead of fifty. If you are going into the business of competing with the express companies without loss to the Government you will have to change your system of rail-way-mail pay either upon the basis suggested by the Postmaster General or some other logical and scientific system that would fit the different classes of matter to be carried. Postage is a flat rate fixed according to one factor—weight—regardless of distance, while in paying for transportation of mail by railroads the Government bases it on two factors—weight and distance. If, for instance, your country route is 100 miles, you can carry 100,000 letters for about the same expense as a single letter, but you could not carry 100,000 sacks of potatoes at the cost of carrying 1. With good roads you might carry 40 or 50 sacks for about the same cost, but there the limit would be reached. In transportation of freight the element of distance becomes a more and more important factor as weight and bulk increase. The Postmaster General in his report proposes a plan. He

READJUSTMENT OF RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

Another problem of great consequence to the postal service that should be acted on by Congress during the coming session is the compensation of the railways for carrying the mails. During the year the department completed the investigation begun early in the administration with the object of determining what it costs the railways to perform this service, and the report of the inquiry was submitted to Congress on the 12th of August last. The statistics obtained during the course of the investigation disclosed for the first time the cost of carrying mail in comparison with the revenue derived by the railways from this service. It appeared from these statistics that while many of the railways, and particularly the larger systems, made heavy profits from mail transportation, certain of the lines were actually carrying the mails at a loss. As a result of the inquiry the importance of making some change in the method of fixing railway mail pay became apparent, and the department, after giving the subject careful consideration, decided to urge the abandonment altogether of the present plan of fixing such compensation on the basis of the weight of the mails carried, a plan that has proved to be exceedingly expensive and in other respects unsatisfactory. In substitution for this method the department recommended a plan by which the compensation should be determined on the basis of the amount of space required in cars for the handling of the mails, making proper allowances, of course, for the extent and frequency of the service performed. The new plan, if authorized by Congress, will require the railway companies each year to report what it costs them to carry the mails, and such other information as will enable the department to determine the cost of mail transportation, this cost to be apportioned on the basis of the car space provided and frequency of service rendered, and payment to be allowed at the rate thus determined in amounts that will cover the cost and 6 per cent profit. Should a railway be dissatisfied with the manner in which the department apportions the cost in fixing compensation, it will have an opportunity, under the proposed plan, to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. If Congress gives the recommendation of the department in this regard its favorable consideration and authorizes a readjustment of railway mail pay in the manner suggested, it is believed that the resulting saving to the Government will amount annually to about $0,000,000.

He estimates his plan would save $9,000,000 a year. doubt if it would result in as great a saving as that, if we depend upon the railways to estimate the cost of doing the service. From what I have observed in the cases where railways rates have been litigated, both in Minnesota and in other States, there seems to be a great diversity of opinion about the cost of the service. The railroads in my State have been able to show that a rate is confiscatory which is perfectly profitable outside of the State in a neighboring territory, and I fear that if they leave it to the railroads to say how much the cost is they will outfigure us. [Laughter.] But the plan contemplates an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some tribunal of that kind, to fix the cost, and then it ought to work out all right.

If the rates of the express companies of the United States had been regulated as they ought to have been regulated and as the railroad rates have been regulated, we would not have had this persistent demand for the Government taking over this species of freight transportation. The express companies have escaped regulation for some reason or other until very recently. We placed the express companies under the Interstate Commerce Commission a couple of years ago, and they have not yet had time to do anything. I understand they are considering that question and are about to issue an order in regard to express rates. I believe if that order is, as is usual with the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, based upon intelligent investigation and upon justice and right it will afford the people more real relief than the proposed new service.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to ask the gentleman a question about the parcel post. On page 35 of the bill there is a paragraph about which I am anxious to have the gentleman's opinion. It says here:

That on each and all rural mail delivery routes of the United States the postmaster at the starting point of such route shall until June 30, 1914, receive and deliver to the carrier or carriers of said routes all articles, parcels, or packages not prohibited to the mails by law and falling under the definition of fourth-class matter and not weighing in excess of 11 pounds, for transportation and delivery on said routes

Further on it says:

And the carriers shall receive at intermediate points on all rural routes such mail matter of the fourth class for delivery on their respective routes only.

That is to say, this bill provides that there shall be this special rule of service if it originates at the distributing office or at any point on a route, but if I live on one route and I wish to send a package on another rural route it can not be done under this provision.

Mr. STEENERSON. No.

Mr. WILLIS. Why can not that be provided? Mr. STEENERSON. They prepared this rural route parcelpost provision in that form, and I presume they wanted to confine it to one route. I could not go into the philosophy of it.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman see any objection now to extending it to all the routes starting at one point?

Mr. STEENERSON. My opinion on that would be of very little value, because I have not made a specialty of that feature of the bill. I think if the gentleman will inquire of the chairman of the committee, or of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Finley], he will get more valuable opinions than he can get from me.

The Hughes commission have made one suggestion, which is that there could be a law providing that the Government should not pay any higher rate than the railroad companies give to the express companies or any other patrons. For instance, it has been stated at the hearings that from a point like New York City to a point like Buffalo, 400 or 500 miles, the rate on newspapers is 1 cent a pound, and under the rates charged by the railroad companies to the Government we lose 5 cents a

Of course we ought to be glad to lose that, so that we can not complain if the express company competes and takes away some of that business. The express companies do take some of that business, because the railroad companies carry the newspapers for one-half cent a pound for that distance, whereas the railroad companies charge two or three times that much, on an average, for that distance to the Government. The Hughes commission made the suggestion that the law governing railway-mail pay might be so amended as to require that in no case should the rates allowed by the Postmaster General exceed the rates which the railroad company itself voluntarily grants to express companies or other patrons of the road, and it seems to me that might be a very valuable suggestion.

The Government now has a monopoly in carrying all letters, or first-class mail, and no one can engage in it; but certainly it would seem to me that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MAD-DEN] is correct in saying that we ought not to assert a monopoly of the package-freight business unless we can do it at a reasonable price. If we should assert a monopoly and charge $240 a ton for it, that would destroy commerce and do more damage than we have ever done good by the postal service. It is ab-

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another matter that I noticed in the speech of the chairman of the committee, and I want to refer to it. I had the honor to serve in the Fifty-eighth, Fiftyninth, and Sixtieth Congresses on this committee with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon], and also in the present Congress, and I cheerfully and heartly testify to his faithfulness in the service of the people. I find in the speech which he made the following remarks:

The Democracy has ever stood against the wicked policy of the Republican Party in attempting to subsidize railroads and ship companies. It gave to me—if I may be pardoned for mentioning it—the signal honor of leading the party in the House in the four great contests upon these questions, in which we were victorious notwithstanding the overwhelming Republican majorities in the House, perhaps the only instances in the last 14 years where the Republican Party was defeated on measures demanded and supported in the national platform. Thus the Treasury was saved $40,000,000.

Now, of course, having served with him on the committee, and being one of the men who opposed the railway subsidy and ship subsidies, I think I am entitled to share in the credit. says that the Treasury was saved $40,000,000. I think the gentleman will certainly concede to the Republicans on the committee that stood by him a share of the honor of defeating the subsidies. In my humble way I think I was the first man to make an attack on the Southern Railway subsidy in the committee. Of course, the chairman was then the leader of the minority party in the committee. I made the fight so far as the Republican side was concerned. When the ship-subsidy fight came on, the Republicans on the committee were divided. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Murdock] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford]—not now here, but who was an able and conscientious Representative-stood by me most manfully. But what I object to in the statement is that he says that the legislation was demanded in the national Republican platform. That would make me out a sort of recalcitrant. I think that is what the ship-subsidy men called me. They had a magazine which they published, and said that I was a "re-calcitrant Republican" because I did not support the ship subsidy. I will insert in my speech the planks of the Republican platforms of 1904 and 1908, and I think I can convince the gentleman that the Republican platform never did declare for a railroad subsidy nor a ship subsidy, and therefore I was not a recalcitrant Republican but a loyal Republican in standing up with the gentleman from Tennessee on that proposition.

From 1904 national Republican platform:

We favor legislation which will encourage and build up the American merchant marine.

From 1908 national Republican platform:

We urge such legislation as will advance the merchant-marine prestige of the country, so essential to the national defense, the enlargement of avenues of trade, and the industrial prosperity of our own

My recollection is that there were more Democrats in the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses who voted for railway subsidies than Republicans; at least a majority of the Democrats, if I recollect right, voted for it, and it was not until the Fifty-ninth Congress that we got rid of that in the Post Office appropriation bill.

I congratulate the gentleman from Tennessee on his splendid record in this matter, but I say that the Republicans who stood by him, both in committee and on the floor of the House, are entitled to share in the honor, and that it is not fair to say that they were opposing the principles of the Republican platform, because all the Republican platform ever said on the sub-ject of subsidies was that it was in favor of laws to encourage the merchant marine, which was all right; they did not say that it should be done in any particular manner. We have done well to preserve the postal revenues for the postal business instead of using them for any such wild enterprise as that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss another matter very briefly for a few moments, which I think will interest my friends on the other side of the House.

On the 11th day of February last year, while the agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration, it was my privilege to submit a few remarks in relation to the then pending Canadian reciprocity bill, and I believe it was the first speech delivered on that subject in the House. As it turned out it was fortunate I did so, because the bill was reported under a rule which excluded general debate.

When the present Congress was called into extra session a year ago, the Democratic Party, then in control of the House, adopted the very same tactics and forced the same measure through under a rule without amendment or free debate. They admitted that it would be unfair to compel the farmers to sell their products in a free-trade market while they had to buy in a highly protected market, but they said they proposed to remedy that by a radical reduction of the tariff downward, with the accent on the D, reducing it to a strictly revenue basis. When it was suggested that it would be safer to amend the reciprocity bill by attaching to it a general revision bill of at least the more important schedules such as wool, cotton, steel, and chemicals, they refused to do so, and proceeded to pass these bills separately, although they knew they had no chance of presidential approval.

So the reciprocity bill became a law, so far as we could make it a law, and it remains a standing offer on our part, and will take effect whenever Canada shall accept it by enacting reciprocal legislation. It is true that at the election held in Canada on the 21st of September last the parliamentary party responsible for the agreement was defeated, partly on that issue, but there is an indication that the Canadians may change their minds upon that subject and accept our offer, which they may do at any time as long as our statute remains unrepealed. On the first day of the present session I introduced a bill to repeal the reciprocity law. It was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, where it has slumbered peacefully ever since. Only last week I asked the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means why his committee would not now take up my bill and report it to the House, and he replied that they expected Canand to change her mind and accept it. I take it that he has reason for that expectation. The same belief has been expressed in other quarters. This will be shown from the extract from the newspaper which I will herewith insert:

INSISTS ON FREE-TRADE "RECIPROCITY."

It is said that President Taft is displeased at the action of the Senate Committee on Finance in reporting favorably the bill repealing (with the exception of section 2, the free paper and pulp section) the Canadian agreement law of July 26, 1911. He wants the law to stand as it is, in the hope that Canada will change her mind and vote to ratify the agreement. The New York Herald's Washington correspondence of March 31 has the following:

"President Taft frequently has expressed his desire that despite the election of the antireciprocity party in Canada last September the act should remain on the statutes. He believes that ultimately the Canadian people will see the benefits of reciprocity and accept the American offer. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, formerly Prime Minister and still leader of the liberal party, believes that reciprocity will ultimately be accepted in Canada if the American offer is left standing.

"The Borden government, which came into power after a bitter and anti-American campaign, would be glad to see the offer withdrawn, the Canadian West feeling that it lost a great opportunity for an improved market for its grain through the rejection of reciprocity. While it is scarcely to be expected that the Borden government, elected as it was by the united support of the protected interests and on an antireciprocity platform, will voluntarily turn to the standing offer, the outlook for the ultimate success of the policy is better than its friends had hoped. A dispatch from Ottawa to the Herald says that the Borden government, should it desire reciprocity, would seek to negotiate a new agreement rather than accept the one negotiated last year."

It is perfectly reasonable, therefore, to say that there is a

It is perfectly reasonable, therefore, to say that there is a probability that unless the act is repealed it may go into effect in the near future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota. Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a deadlock, so that we have this situation: If the Canadians accept our offer that law will go into effect, but the farmer will get no compensation. It was argued here on the floor of this House that they were going to pass a free-list bill to compensate the farmer for his loss, and other tariff bills to compensate him for his loss, But he gets nothing because of the deadlock. The Tariff Board has reported, and it shows conclusively that both the wool and the cotton schedules are entirely too high, and, in the language of the President, indefensible, and yet no relief is promised. I could go into the specific items in that report to show how unreasonably high some of the rates are, and how the wool duties are so arranged that the manufacturer is, by the system of compensatory duties, compensated for what he does not pay, while the woolgrower is cheated out of the protection he is supposed to get. But I have not the time here.

Mr. Chairman, why should the farmer be subject to this danger of Canadian free trade while all other producers of the country are to continue to enjoy the advantage of extremely high duties? The Democratic leaders admitted when they proposed the farmers' free-list bill that they ought to compensate the farmers for the loss by reason of Canadian reciprocity, but they are now willing to take away or refuse that compen-The situation will be that the manufacturers, shielded by a friendly veto, will continue to enjoy excessive duties, while the farmer, if the Canadian reciprocity is accepted, will have He will be not the beneficiary, but the victim of free trade.

tariff revision. We all know why the Democrats passed the Canadian reciprocity bill. It was not because they liked it. They recognized full well that it was a one-sided affair, that the duties were so arranged as to sacrifice the farmers for the benefit of the manufacturers, and their benefit only. They passed that bill because they were under obligation to the President to do so. The President would not have called them into extra session and given them the opportunity that an extra session yielded unless he had understood that they were going to pass the Canadian reciprocity bill. They performed their share of the arrangement, whether it was a tacit or an express agreement. They passed that bill, because the President would not have called them together unless they had in some way convinced him they would do so. The Canadian people were given an opportunity to vote upon that proposition, and they voted against it. They refused to accept it. Is there any obligation on the part of the Democratic Party to continue that law now? I say none. I say, as I said to the chairman, they ought to report a repeal bill, because they have done their duty as the President expected them to do it. They have given the consideration that he expected when they passed the bill, and, in order to prevent an injustice to the farmer resulting, they ought now to repeal the law. They may think that it is politically unwise to do so, but they certainly can not afford to go before the people and defend that kind of reciprocity. Are they going into this coming elec-tion and say that it is right to sacrifice the farmer's home market in favor or the automobile manufacturer? Are they going to say that it is right to put a duty of one dollar and a quarter a hundred on dressed meat or $10 on an 800-pound steer when they give him the steer free from Canada?

The conversion charge, of which you have heard so much in tariff discussion, is in that case less than a dollar, and you give a duty of $10, 1,000 per cent more than the total cost of production. Are you going to defend that in the next election? Then why not repeal it? There is no object in keeping it on the statute books, because if you are successful in the next campaign you certainly ought to be able to enact a more fair and a more just law than that. I say to the Democrats that you will gain nothing by refusing to repeal this law, and you are under no obligation to refuse to do so, but you are under obligation to repeal it because the tariff legislation that you have passed through this House will be deadlocked and will be ineffectual to save the farmer, and therefore the farmer is entitled to stand in the same place he stood before you started this latest tariff-revision program. If you do not do that you will readily see you are putting the farmers and not the President in a hole, because you have not given to the farmers that which they ought to have if they are going to bear these bur-dens which they are likely to do in case the Canadians change their minds. I therefore submit to the judgment of the majority of this House that they ought to report favorably the bill to repeal the Canadian reciprocity and let us go over to where we were before we started this proposed revision. We should not revise on the farmer until everybody else has also been revised. You should not let these people who are interested in Canadian reciprocity eat at the first table and let the farmer wait until the last table. You should serve them at the same table equally. [Applause.]
Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the spring of 1910 a gentleman, Nathan B. Williams, of Fayetteville, Ark., wrote me a letter pointing out the fact that the Government of the United States does not assert its monopoly in the carriage of second, third, and fourth class mail matter. Shortly after receiving that letter I informed myself on the subject and introduced a resolution in this House dealing exhaustively with the matter. Out of this there has grown up a discussion throughout the country, in this body and in the Senate, over the Government's right to exercise a monopoly in the carriage of the mails. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in his speech here this afternoon, insisted that it was not possible to assert that monopoly. Unfortunately, I did not hear him. I regret it, and I am taking that view of his speech from the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Steenerson] who has just taken his seat.

I am one of those who do not believe that any governmental control over postage rates can be wholly effective until the Government asserts its monopoly in the carriage of mail matter. As I have pointed out for the last two years in these debates, if the Government has a flat, country-wide, inflexible rate the express companies, as competitors, will take over the short-haul business, which is renunerative, and leave the long-haul business, which is not remunerative, to the Government.

In order to throw some light on the power of the express companies to compete with the Government in the carriage of parcels I desire to make a short comparison between the rates provided in the proposed change in fourth-class rates in the pending bill and the rate charged by the American Express Co. to the postmaster general of Great Britain for the delivery of packages in the United States.

This contract was made between the American Express Co. and Great Britain in 1902, and a copy of it is on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The rates under the present proposed reduction of the fourthclass postage rate from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound and the raising of the mailable weight from 4 pounds to 11 pounds may be stated as follows, for the purpose of comparison with the British-American Express Co. rates:

Where the weight of the parcel exceeds 3 pounds, but does not exceed 7 pounds.

Where the weight of the parcel exceeds 7 pounds, but does not 48 exceed 11 pounds. A cursory glance at these figures will show that if the provision in the present post-office supply bill should become law the American Express Co. would not find a very serious competitor in the Government in the business of carrying parcels. this is not saying that the American Express Co. will deliver an 11-pound package for the American citizen for 60 cents, as it does for the British post office, in case this bill becomes law. It rather means that the express company will charge $1 or $1.25 for the delivery of an 11-pound parcel for the longer distances, for the express companies will continue to cut just under the Government's merchandise postage rates, in order to take most of the business away from the Government and yet main-

The express companies were driven out of the field of competition in the carriage of first-class mail in 1844. Until they were driven out the Government was helpless in its handling of first-class mail. Since then the Government has been supreme in that field. But in the meantime the express companies have waxed fat in the profits of the mailable parcel business, how-ever, and if the rates given to the British Government for the delivery of parcels in America by the American Express Co. are illuminating at all, they certainly reveal that a new governmental 12 cents a pound rate will not disturb them. They should be driven from our field; then we can advance in this matter with some certainty. I append that part of the contract between the British Government and the American Express Co. which pertains to rates, that its exact terms may be known:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Cullor having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 3, 1912: H. R. 22772. An act appropriating $350,000 for the purposes of maintaining and protecting against impending floods the levees on the Mississippi River.

H. J. Res. 263. Joint resolution to authorize allotments to Indians of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., of lands valuable for coal.

On April 5, 1912

H. J. Res. 232. Joint resolution extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

On April 8, 1912:

H. R. 15471. An act making appropriation for repair, preservation, and exhibition of the trophy flags now in store in the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

On April 9, 1912: H. R. 20842. An act to provide for a tax upon white phosphorus matches, and for other purposes.

On April 12, 1912: H. R. 14918. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CATLIN].

Mr. CATLIN. Mr. Chairman, after protracted and persistent agitation covering a period of many years, the question is now directly presented to the House of passing upon the advisability of establishing or experimenting with, though in a limited way, a parcel post in this country.

The demand for this extension in our postal system has arisen primarily because of a general feeling on the part of the people that they should be relieved from the burden of having to pay unfair and exorbitant express rates in the shipment of their small packages. I share with others in this view and in the belief that something should be done to remedy this hardship and prevent the conveniences of the people from being sacrificed for the continuing riches and aggrandizement of the express companies; however, I do not believe that the remedy for this is through the establishment of a parcels post, but rather that the obstacle is to be overcome by governmental regulation of express rates themselves, as in the case of railroad rates, through the decrees of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose power has already been extended to such matter by the action of a former Congress

In its report the committee admits the necessity for conservative legislation on this subject and that some definite information should be gathered and obtained through commission investigation before any general and unlimited law should be established, but it proposes, in the bill presented, for the Government to first experiment in a limited way with a parcels post by providing for such a system on each of the rural routes for a period of two years, the postage rate to be 5 cents per pound for the first pound and 2 cents per pound over 1 pound and for fractions of a pound, up to 11 pounds' limit, on the theory that, if such a scheme shall prove unwise, it can be repealed or expire by limitation at the end of that time.

I object to the idea of experimenting at all, even in a limited way, in this important matter until after a careful investigation. just as I believe it is best to have accurate facts and information about the tariff schedules from a Tariff Board in order to properly fix the duties. Besides, such a limited parcels post on the rural routes will not be a fair test or experiment as to probable effects of a universal system, and while it will doubtless not prove as harmful as an unlimited one covering the entire country, still it is objectionable in that it would in the end probably be an entering wedge for a general parcels post, and for that reason I am not in favor of it.

It does not follow because parcels post has worked to advantage in England, Germany, and other European countries that would be equally beneficial and profitable in the United States, where conditions as to area of square miles, number of people, and density of population are quite different. parcels post of England serves a population of about 42,000,000 of thickly settled people within an area of about 120,000 square miles, whereas we have a population of about 90,000,000, sparsely settled, and in an area of three and one-half millions or more square miles; or, in other words, thirty times more area to cover and only about twice the population, all of which will necessarily make a difference in the expense of carrying

I can not divorce myself from the conviction and argument that a domestic parcels post will drive out of business the country merchant and retailer, and have an injurious effect upon the rural towns and communities by decreasing property values and by tending to deplete them through a drift of their population to the larger cities, where business will necessarily become concentrated. Already this overcrowding of the cities is one of the causes of our present high cost of living, a condition rather to be avoided than further encouraged, and so appeal is constantly being made for the people to again go back to the smaller towns and farms. Moreover, the trade of the jobbing houses will be materially injured, if not destroyed, and the traveling men displaced by catalogues. In short, the commercial system of the country will be completely revolutionized by sub-stituting mail-order houses and cash payments for the credit system now existing and so important a factor in the development and building of new communities, and which many feel, as I do, is still much needed. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dyen].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, there are many features in this bill that I highly commend and which will have a tendency to work for the betterment and improvement of the service. It is not my intention at this time to enter into a discussion of the bill in general and to point out the improvements provided for in this bill for the clerks, carriers, railway mail clerks, and so forth. When the bill is read under the five-minute rule I hope to speak on these matters in detail and suggest still further changes in the present law, and probably offer some amendther changes in the present law, and probably offer some amendments to certain provisions of this bill, which, in my judgment, are needed to increase the pay in certain instances, provide for 30 days' annual leave for all the employees of the Post Office Department, as well as benefit the men by improving the conditions and facilities under which they have to work. At this time I rise specially to enter my opposition against section 8 of this bill, which section has to do with the establishment of a parcel post. I do not believe that the country is ready or prepared for the enactment into a law of that portion of this bill. I am one of those who believe that before entering upon so great a project, untried and new to this country, that a careful investigation should first be had as to the probable effect the establishment of a parcel post will have to the whole country, including its various industries and its people generally, This bill, so far as it refers to the establishment of a parcelpost law, is said to be for the special benefit of farmers. It is not claimed that it is to benefit any other class of people, but only those living upon rural free delivery routes. While I am heartily in favor of enacting legislation that will be of benefit to the farmers, I can not see my duty clear to vote for a law that will be harmful to the great commercial and retail interests of our country. Many thousands of men are employed in these industries, and I would be recreant to my duty as a Member of Congress should I favor the establishment of a parcel post, when, in my judgment, it would do irreparable damage to the great manufacturing and commercial houses, jobbers, and other industries, the success of which must and does mean the happiness and prosperity of so many people who obtain their liveli-hood in the employment therein and have their homes in the great cities and industrial centers of this country. The farmers, as a class, are as prosperous to-day as any people in our country, and we should turn our attention to the prosperity of millions of our people who do not earn their livelihood from the farm, and it is especially in the interests of that part of our American people that I enter my protest against the parcel-post feature of the bill now under consideration.

I have here a number of protests from representative citizens, commercial and individual interests, in my district who are opposed to the parcel-post feature of this bill. I desire to call the attention of the committee to these protests, with the hope that it will aid in the elimination of that section of this bill. I desire, Mr. Chairman, that I may have permission to insert in the RECORD the letters referred to for the information of the

Dear Sir: In reply to yours of the 6th instant. We are very glad to have an opportunity to express our opinion on the subject of the proposed parcel-post appropriation (II, R. 21279), section 8.

In considering this matter we have endeavored to eliminate any selfsh business reasons that we may have against the passage of a general parcel post and to look at it solely from the broad view as to what is best for the country. If you will investigate, I think you will find that the equipment and facilities of the rural free delivery are such that it would be unable to handle either promptly or economically the great amount of business which would be thrust upon it by the passage of a general parcel-post bill, thus merely adding to the deficit of the Post Office Department instead of assisting in any way. It is an old business principle never to undertake extended business without first being ready for it in the way of handling facilities.

The principal objection would be the almost inevitable result of putting out of business the retail dealer in the small towns, because by means of a general parcel post the catalogue or mail-order houses in the large cities would be enabled to undersell the customers of this refailer on all the rural free-delivery routes. For instance, a retailer situated, say, in Kanasa buys the bulk of his goods from the jobbing trade, and in one shape or another pays the freight on such goods from the manufacturer to his own town, while the catalogue or mall-order house in Chicago would find a large portion of this transportation charge absorbed by a general parcel post. You will readily see that under a general parcel post any transportation of articles, save for a very short distance, would inevitably prove exceedingly expensive; in fact, they would cost more than they would bring in the way of revenue, because of the flat rate which is apportioned without any regard as to distance. It is quite a serious question as to whether the consumer would, in the long run, obtain his goods any cheaper by patronizing dealing with the nearest town or city. It seems to use a very heavy price to pay for such possible reduction by the ellimation of one of the most valuable types of citizens and the drying up the small town, which is fast becoming the center of life and activity for all the neighboring farming community. Not only does the retailer now supply the farmers in his vicinity with all their wants, but he likewise takes their farm produce in exchange for his goods, gives them credit when they need it, and none of these things would be possible on the centralized plan where the farmer would deal with a large distribution is from the wholesaler to the retailer and from the retailer of the consumer, thus utilizing a large number of small distributing centers which are scattered throughout the country, and these centers are constantly growing and multiplying. They enable both the retailer and the consumer to get his goods quickly as he needs them and when he needs them, and so far this method seems to have proved both efficient and economical. We are quite convinced from over half a century of experience that it is the natural way and will continue, unless it be overfirown by some arbitrary and artificia

My Dear Congressman: We understand the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives contemplate reporting a bill providing for an extension of the international parcelpost agreement, as well as experimental local rural parcel post, together with a commission to investigate the subject.

We are firmly of the opinion that once a parcel-post law is written on the statute books the provision for a commission to investigate the subject will be of little or no avail.

We therefore urge upon you to use your influence, as well as power, looking toward the appointment of an impartial commission, and that no legislation be attempted until such a commission shall have made a thorough investigation and reported its findings, and the writer would appreciate a line from you in said connection.

Dear Sir: We appreciate your inquiry of March 7 and thank you for your courtesy in sending us the copy of House bill No. 21279 with the committee report on same. In reply will say that we believe that portion of the bill providing for the extension of parcel post to cover rural routes should be defeated. If a commission is to be appointed to investigate the result of the workings of parcel post in Europe, the commission should be permitted to make its report before parcel post is extended. This goes without saying. We are opposed to all parcel post whether the limit in weight be 4 pounds, 11 pounds, or 100 pounds for the reason that we do not consider the moving of merchandise as a proper function of the postal department. The Government has control over the railroads and the express companies and should exercise that control, but do not see that the postal department has any more business carrying freight than the Department of Agriculture has to sell potatoes at less than cost to break a high potato market. The mere fact that the carrying of letters, which is the proper function of the postal department, yields that department a profit is no sound argument for the establishment of a freight-traffic department by the Post Office Department or the turning of the postal department into a common carrier.

ment for the establishment of a freight-traffic department by the Post Office Department or the turning of the postal department into a common earrier.

The only possible argument there can be for the establishment of a general parcel post is that it may facilitate the buying of goods by people in local communities from the mall-order houses or department stores. The effect that this has had in Europe is to practically eliminate the country town and make of it merely a "wide place in the road." The country merchant is not a merchant in Europe, but merely a storekeeper. We do not believe that any good American wants to see European conditions established in America. Investigation by a properly qualified commission will show that the European method of distribution does not result in a saving to the consumer, but merely inconveniences him in forcing him to wait for a mail-order shipment from the big distributing city. We do not believe that a parcel-post law will force the country merchant out of business, but it will naturally take away from him much of his trade in what may be termed the "luxuries," the profit on which to-day makes up for no profit on many of the staples, such as sugar and other articles that are bought by the people in large quantities. If the trade in the luxuries is removed, the country merchant must charge more for his staples. Statistics will show that the retail merchant is just about making both ends meet at the present time, hence a loss of his profit on luxuries will, as above stated, have to be made up by higher prices to the consumer on the staples.

We favor the commission plan because we are confident it will show the weakness of the European system of distribution and demonstrate that in this particular, as in practically all others, the United States is head and shoulders above the other nations of the world.

Mr Dear Sin: Your favor of the 6th instant, also copy of the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279) and report accompanying same, duly received.

We realize that as interested parties our position in the matter might be misunderstood, but we sincerely believe that the supposed benefits to be derived from this measure will be far offset by the undesirable consequences bound to follow. Of course, you know about "the back-to-the-country" movement. The tendency of the times is for the people to leave the farm and small country towns and go to the cities. Magazines and the daily press are advocating "parcel post," and this measure, while supposedly in the interest of the farmer, bringing delivery to his door, really acts as a destroyer of life in the small country town. It will almost annihilate the small country merchant, and in consequence mitigate against the prosperity of the small country towns. Conditions in this country are not the same as they are in Europe. Many city papers are probably advocating this measure because they want the advertising from the large department stores, who are fast becoming mail-order houses and would utilize "parcel post." to drive out of business the small country merchants. It will deteriorate our manufactures, because goods sold from pictures, as they must be ff sold from catalogue and delivered through "parcel post." will not possess the merit that goods must have if bought where the buyer has the right to investigate the merchandise before purchasing the same; in buying from mail-order houses he must send his money in advance. He has no chance to see the goods. This act will concentrate business in the hands of the few—the large mail-order houses and department stores—and you can readily understand what the final outcome would be, which, we believe is contrary to the spirit of our people, for we want to save the small or middle man.

You are probably aware of the different arguments advanced against "parcel post by the American League of Associations at Chicago, as well measure. Respectfully,

ROBERTS, JOHNSON & RAND SHOE Co.. St. Louis, Mo., March 14, 1912.

Hon. L. C. DYER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As requested by you in your favor of March 6, we have read the section of House bill 21279 referring to parcel post and the report of the committee thereon.

In our opinion the passage of this bill will destroy the business of small towns and the small merchants. It will centralize the business in large cities and put it in the power of a few great corporations to practically control the business of the country as a whole. Every consumershould be interested in his immediate community. If he is a farmer, his lands will enhance in value in comparison with the growth of his nearest town. Statistics on land values all over America absolutely demonstrate this fact, and we are quite sure that the decline in the value of real estate brought about by the centralization of business in large centers will more than offset any gain in the price of merchandise that night result from the ability of the small communities to market in the large centers.

If the bill could be so drawn as to absolutely prohibit any article being accepted by rural mall delivery that did not originate at the starting point of the route and from actual dealers, and not from agents representing large establishments, who might establish agents to distribute merchandise that would be sent by freight to the various points where rural mail routes start from, if this bill could be so sate-guarded, we could see no special objection to the bill. As far as this company is concerned, we are indifferent as to what is done. If it became necessary, we could no doubt distribute our merchandise to the consumer at a better profit than we are now doing to the retailer and at some saving to the consumer.

We are very much of the opinion, however, that the passage of this bill would be a detriment to the country as a whole. Anyone who has ever traveled through Europe can see clearly the effects of the parcelpost bill. Small towns have little or no general mercantile business, the consumers depending almost entirely on the large centers for their supplies, and we are sure that the passage of this measure will have the same results in this country.

Yours, very truly,

J. Johnson.

Dear Sir: We have yours of the 6th, in which you ask our opinion regarding bill H. R. 21279 and report accompanying same.

From the knowledge we have through newspaper publicity regarding parcel post we are very much opposed to it, and hope that you see the matter in the same light as we do, and endeavor your utmost to keep it from becoming a law. To us it appears it would mean a general upsetting of the whole country again and the gathering by a few large department stores in the metropolitan cities the entire retail business of the country, which is in itself a detriment to all interests—only another form of trusts.

The centralizing of the retail business in the hands of a few mailorder houses and department stores will throw millions of people out of work and reduce values of farm lands and products.

We sincerely trust that the bill will not pass.

Dear Sir: Beg to advise you that I am opposed to the passage of the parcel-post bill now pending in Congress and upon which you will soon be called to vote. Principally because the large cities will be benefited at the expense of the smaller towns. The business of the National Pickle & Canning Co., of which I am assistant general superintendent, is done mainly in the small towns, the prosperity of which means to success of our business and the success of our business means the general prosperity of hundreds of our employees, and it seems to me that, in general, the large mail-order concerns, who are few in number, will be benefited largely at the expense of the small country merchant, of whom there are many scattered about doing good to their communities. I hope the bill gets no further than it now is, and that you will see your way clear to vote against it.

Dean Sir: Inclosed herewith you will please find copy of a letter singed by Mr. D. H. Naylor, jr., and addressed to a number of people in the Northwest country, the object of which is self-explanatory. I desire particularly to call your attention to the marked lines which conclusively prove the contention which the retail merchants of this country have brought forward, that the great agitation for parcel post in this country emanates from the mail-order houses. The original of this letter is on file with the Mississippi Valley Lumberman, Minneapolis, Minn., and can be verified by any Member of Congress. In view of the statements made in this letter I am warranted again in the name of the retail merchants of this country in protesting against the passage of any parcel-post legislation, and I trust that the evidence is so conclusive as to the real purpose and who are the real promoters of this proposed legislation and the objects which they hope to accomplish that you will east your influence and vote against any action upon this question. Certainly it is of such great importance that before doing so you ought to be willing to have the entire question investigated by a competent commission in order that intelligent action may be had by Congress.

Respectfully, J. R. MOOREHEAD,

[From the Mississippi Valley Lumberman, Feb. 9, 1912.] THE CATALOGUE HOUSE AND PARCEL POST-OPEN ADMISSION THAT THE LATTER WILL HELP THE FORMER.

During the past few weeks circular letters have been received by a number of people in the Northwest from D. H. Naylor, whose business card announces that he is the fiscal manager for M. W. Savage interests, of Minneapolis. This letter contains a number of statements regarding the great profits made by the catalogue houses, and offers to furnish information concerning the new issue of stock by M. W. Savage Factory (Inc.), for the purpose of financing an extension of business of that concern into a general catalogue house.

The point to which particular attention is called and which is commented upon in the editorial columns of this issue of the Lumberman is that the anticipated parcel-post legislation promises to enable catalogue houses to greatly increase their business. Further comment than that offered in the editorial referred to is not necessary here, excepting to impress the important fact upon all retail dealers that they should at once communicate with their Senators and Representatives in Congress, urging them to oppose the proposed parcel-post legislation. Following is the full text of the letter referred to above:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 31, 1912.

Dear Sir: The mail-order business of the "catalogue house" probably offers the greatest possibilities of any industry to-day.

While their profit on an individual article is small, the total profits on the hundreds of thousands of articles sold yearly enable them to earn and pay big dividends.

Take Sears-Roebuck, for instance; their total volume of business last year is reported as being over $60,000,000. Whether these figures are exactly correct or not, we know this, that they did pay a dividend of 33½ per cent on their common stock after paying 7 per cent on the preferred stock outstanding.

Only a few years ago you could have secured common stock in that company for about $20 per share; to-day it is selling for about $180 per share.

Now, one more point regarding this mail order business.

company for about $20 per share; to-day it is selling for about $180 per share.

Now, one more point regarding this mail-order business. Statistics show it is rapidly increasing, and it is certain that just as soon as the parcel-post legislation is enacted it will without question increase to fifty times its present enormous volume.

During the present year one of the oldest and most successful firms in a special line of the mail-order business in Minneapolis has quietly branched out into a general catalogue house. While its main office will be in this city, it has a Chicago branch to handle the business from Eastern and Southern States.

The first big catalogue is already published, and many thousands of this edition are now in the hands of the consumers throughout the entire country. The orders are coming in in fine shape, and increasing daily.

The company, to take care of the increasing business, is planning on placing a little more of its stock with the investors. If you are in a position to consider an investment during the next month or so, this is a proposition that will be well worth your time to look into carefully. Don't overlook this point: It is an industry with unlimited possibilities and backed by successful and wealthy "interests." If you would like to receive full particulars, look over their catalogue and other mighty interesting data, just mail me the inclosed post card to-day. It will place you under no obligation whatever.

Very truly, yours.

Dear Sir: We have your letter of March 6, asking us for an expression in regard to the proposed parcel-post legislation.

This matter has been so thoroughly thrashed out from every point of yearcel post, but wish to say that in our judgment, and that of our customers, it will work a serious injury to the jobbing and retail interests, thereby indirectly affecting adversely the interests of the farmers and laborers, whose prosperity is thoroughly identified with that of the merchants of the smaller towns. We believe that the investigation which you have no doubt made will bear out the truth of this contention, and we trust that your vote and influence will be recorded against the adoption of the bill.

Dear Sir: We are again advised that some parcel-post bills that are now before the House and Senate have been, or would be, reported favorably by the committees having them in charge.

We believe that it would be a very great mistake for any legislation of this kind to be passed without a more thorough investigation, and we ask again that you use your best endeavors to have a commission appointed to investigate the condition of the parcel post in foreign countries where it is now in force and to fully examine into the difference of conditions prevailing there and those prevailing in the United States.

We are sure that the conditions are so radically different that you would be convinced that the parcel post as outlined by the present bills would not be acceptable or to the advantage of the majority of the people of the United States.

Dear Sir: We wish to enter our profest against the proposed parcelpost measures now pending in Congress, and to ask that you give your voice and vote against their passage. We do this for the very good reasons, as it seems to us, that the parcel post would mean, first, a very great deficit in the postal revenues, not alone because of the cost of carrying same, but in the incidental expense necessary to handling the very greatly increased volume of fourth-class mail.

It would recessarily mean very large additions to most of the post offices in the cities; additional clerks to handle the parcels, and, in case of the rural routes, not only additional salaries to the rural carriers, but provisions for two horses where one is now sufficient, or that four would be necessary where two are now used, together with the increased cost of the vehicles for transporting the additional volume of mails.

We believe, further, that the Government has no right to go into the general carrying business; that it is wrong in theory and would be costly and cumbersome in practice. Further, it is, in a way, very detrimental to the mercantile business of the smaller towns, and will tend logically to the further upbuilding of the large cities and the destruction of the smaller town as a market place. This logically also would mean the destruction of present values of farm properties adjacent to the small towns and would demoralize business and society throughout the country. The demand for this parcel post, we honestly believe, is not a genuine one even on the part of the farmers, but is promulgated by the farm and mail-order papers which depend upon the catalogue and mail-order houses for their subsistence, and they thus foster an apparent demand that is perfunctory and not actually representative of the desires of the farmers themselves except as they are misled by specious arguments to work for it.

If a parcel post is contemplated, we would suggest that Congress appoint a special commission to investigate conditions abroad where parcel post prevails to look into both sides of the question. If it means a reduction of American rural communities to a state similar to those of Europe which "enjoy" parcel post, we do not believe the American people, as represented by their Senators and Representatives in Congress, would stand for it a minute.

Rather than to think of the Government going to the expense of adopting a general or parcel-post extension, allow us to suggest that a real need of the people is for 1-cent letter postage, and we would be very glad indeed to have you support House bill No. 17736.

We have written you at length on this subject because we feel deeply the importance of it to our city and the country in general. We know that we speak for practically every retail implement, vehicle, and hardware Club, of which the writer is se Vehicle, and Hardware Club, of which treasurer.

We trust you will give this matter the consideration it deserves, and that you will aid us in defeating what we believe to be an oncrous measure designed and promulgated in the interest of the mail-order business almost solely.

Respectfully, yours,

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hay, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AMERICAN MEAT (H. DOC. NO. 694).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Secretary of Agriculture, with my consent, has sent, through the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Congress an estimate for an appropriation of $1,000,000 beyond the present permanent appropriation for the meat-inspection service in the Department of Agriculture. The increase is necessary to en-able the department to inspect microscopically the flesh of hogs that is to be converted into meat food products which ordi-narily are eaten without cooking. Several deaths have resulted from eating such products which contained trichinæ. The Swiss minister is now seeking reparation on account of the deaths and serious illness of several citizens of Switzerland. These deaths and serious illnesses are claimed to have been caused by eating American meat which contained triching. The Department of Agriculture has issued warning circulars and caused notices to be printed in the newspapers of the country concerning the danger of eating such uncooked products. The microscopic inspection of the flesh of all hogs would require an increase of $4,000,000 in the appropriation. This is not deemed necessary. There is ample authority in the meat-inspection act to make the microscopic inspection, but no money has ever been provided. Therefore I urge upon the Congress the appropriation of $1,000,000 for this purpose, on the ground that the emergency demands such action.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 12, 1912.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20190. An act to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Rock River, Ill.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 20190. An act to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Rock River, Ill.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of H. R. 20207, Sixtieth Congress, first session, introduced by Congressman Haggot, to pay John O'Connell certain moneys as custodian of old Fort Lyman, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of James L. Carpenter (H. R. 5720), first session Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. Dickson of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. Hensley, for three weeks, on account of important public business.

To Mr. Callaway, for three weeks, on account of important public business.

To Mr. HANNA, for three weeks, on account of important public business.

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN EMPLOYERS AND LABORERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

The Committee on Labor is hereby discharged from further consideration of H. R. 23189, to make lawful certain agreements between employers and laborers and persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture, and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases, and for other purposes, and the same is hereby referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARTLETT, That bill has been referred to the Committee on Labor?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BARTLETT. Has the Committee on Labor asked to have its reference changed?

The SPEAKER. No. The Committee on Labor did not ask it. The Committee on the Judiciary did, and all bills of that kind have been formerly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not care to take issue with the Speaker on that statement, but the change of reference, except by unanimous consent, is made in a way pointed out by the rules, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is exactly what we are trying to get.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know the rule. The Clerk read the statement that the reference of the bill was to be changed from the Committee on Labor to the Committee on the Judiciary. The rule, as I understand it, is that it must be done by unanimous consent, otherwise by motion at request from one of the two committees.

The SPEAKER. The usual modus operandi is that the Clerk reads the statement, whatever it is, and then the Chair says, "Without objection, the change will be made."

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this with reference to that bill: It is a bill drawn by myself and Senator BACON; and the bill introduced in the Senate was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which Senator Borah is chairman. I will say that when I introduced the bill in the House I indorsed on it, "Referred to Committee on Labor," and am responsible for the reference to that committee. I wrote on it myself that it was referred to the Committee on Labor, because the bill, as its title indicated, had reference to disputes between employers and laborers and employees. While I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—as there are some things in it on which they would have jurisdiction—there are some things in it over which the Committee on Labor has jurisdiction. If the Committee on the Judiciary desire to have this bill referred to it, and make it known in a proper way, I will raise no objection to that. If the Committee on Labor, to which it has been referred, desire that the bill be not considered by that committee. but by the Judiciary Committee, I will have no objection to that. But I have not been consulted as to the change of reference. and I think I should have been. Therefore, at present, with really no objection, however, as to where it goes-either to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Labor-I shall RECESS.

At 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., in accordance with the order previously agreed to, the House took a recess until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

At 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., the recess having expired, the Speaker called the House to order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21279, with Mr. Saunders in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 21279, making appropriations for the Post Office Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] 25 minutes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I have frequently noted that part of the routine of the House in which this is appropriately called "the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union." I understand, of course, that we have been considering this afternoon a very important bill, the Post Office appropriation bill. But I desire to say something on the state of the Union that will be of importance and interest to the Members of the House and perhaps to the whole country upon another subject with which I am intimately acquainted and, I think, quite important.

For many weeks a very hard-worked committee—the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture—has been busy in the investigation of that department, and the subject of their more recent investigation has been popularly known as the Everglades investigation. Now, it is my purpose to deal with some of the matters in connection with that investigation which were not properly in all respects admitted in the testimony, because there was a regular line drawn by which the committee was to conduct its examinations. There was a regular plan mapped out, and a great deal of the testimony and matter which was correlative and which was in many respects important evidence was not admissible under the plan of investigation.

I desire to say that I do not in any respect intend any discourtesy to that committee nor to its very efficient chairman, Mr. Moss, and do not desire to forestall its report, which will appear before the Members of this House in due time. But in treating the subject I am obliged to deal with the facts which that committee will eventually no doubt include in its report.

In the latter part of 1907 a field force of engineers, in charge of one J. O. Wright, an employee of the Bureau of Drainage Investigations of the Department of Agriculture, was sent to Florida to investigate a plan for draining a large portion of the Everglades. In June, 1908, Mr. Wright made his report to his superior officer, Dr. C. G. Elliott, who was chief of this bureau. This report has not yet been published by the department, except in abstract form, and has not been published at all outside of Senate Document No. 89, which was printed upon the assumed authority of a resolution passed through the United States Senate August 7, 1911, or more than three years after this report was made. Let it be understood that Senate Document No. 89 was not published at the instigation of the Department of Agriculture or any of its officials, and does not contain the full report which, in its final revision, was the one which the department was willing to stand for as correct. Hence, it is true that the department has never published this report.

The object of the investigation was to ascertain whether certain allegations that had been made by Congressman Clark and myself were true. One of the allegations was that the department had suppressed a certain part of the report at the instigation of those who were interested in the sale of Everglade lands. No. 2 was, as a sidelight upon the matter and really not material, that Secretary Wilson, when requested to give the reason why he had suppressed this part of the report, said he was not running the department for the benefit of fools who did not know better than to buy land which they had not

I had appeared before the committee asking for an investigation, and Mr. Clark had also appeared for the same purpose. Hence the aim of Solicitor McCabe, in his defense of the Secretary, was to strike at us. He attempted to show that we were actuated by selfish and improper motives. In an effort to discredit Congressman Clark he produced correspondence which was utterly irrelevant to the inquiry, inconsequential, and finally revealing his futile attempt to prove that Clark himself was a dealer in land that might be in competition with the Everglades, and hence that Clark's motives showed bias and were not altogether disinterested. All that Solicitor McCabe brought out on this point was that Mr. Clark had casually, not as a man in the real-estate business—for he never was in that business—but simply incidentally, written one or two letters to some gentlemen who had asked him to find for them a piece of land in the State of Florida.

Mr. Clark wrote to them about one piece of land only, which he did not own himself and which was at least 250 miles distant from the Everglades, of an entirely different character of soil, and consequently not in competition with the Everglades in any manner. Mr. Clark has no land whatever in the State of Florida for sale, and this imputation upon his motives in asking for this investigation was wholly unfounded and without basis of fact.

Having thus assailed Mr. Clark's motives, the Secretary seized upon an opportunity to make a statement regarding a farm which I have in Florida, and upon which the chief product raised is potatoes. The attempt to induce the public, in widely published newspaper reports, to believe that I have conflicting interests in Florida, and that for this reason I demanded this investigation, is "very small potatoes," indeed.

It is true that I am part owner of 160 acres, situated over 300 miles from the Everglades in question. This property is purely a farm proposition. I have no land in Florida for sale, and this farm is not for sale, except under those conditions which might arise wherein any person might desire or be called upon to sell any property which he might own. I am in no way, directly or indirectly, interested in the real-estate business in the State of Florida, and I have no business connection of any character which would bring me into competition with the Florida Everglades. But my ownership in this farm and the experience in Florida agriculture, running over a period of to 10 years, is in truth the very reason why I have been interested in the investigation of the Florida Everglades carried on by the Moss committee. I believe that the manner employed by the land sharks of Florida in exploiting the Everglades was an exhibition of unusually bold misrepresentation and exaggeration, and I sought, in my official capacity, to assist, as far as possible, in saving the innocent poor people of this country from loss and disappointment.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATHRICK. Not now. I will yield later, but I prefer to go on with my statement at this time.

Mr. Chairman, there is no hope born in the human breast more wholesome and sacred than the hunger for home, wherein the beautiful visions of those not blessed with wealth by birth conjure to the mind of the struggling poor pictures of domestic happiness, comfort, and plenty, which can only be realized by the ownership of a home. Millions of our people are without this blessing, and those who clothe a lie in the habiliments of truth, and use it to delude the home seeker, are the vilest of all impostors and the most worthy of that indignant condemnation and odium deserved by any class of culprits who commit wrong in the name of business.

On some other occasion it will be my pleasure to deal with the question of the feasibility of the drainage proposition of the Everglades, and of the availability for agricultural purposes of this land, should they ever succeed in draining them; but at this time I desire to consider more fully those matters which bear upon the attitude of those defending the Department of Agriculture and Secretary Wilson in this investigation.

During Secretary Wilson's pretended testimony, which in many respects appeared to me as a plain evasion of testifying, he made vague and ambiguous reference to the subject of liars in this and other countries. Shortly thereafter, by way of more direct connection with those witnesses who were the object of his spleen, in pointed allusion he accused Congressman Clark, W. R. Hardee, and Capt. Sewell of having framed up their testimony. In other words, when not specifically referring to those gentlemen, he accused them of collusion in the arrangement of their evidence.

Congressman Clark, Mr. Hardee, and Capt, Sewell had sworn the Secretary told them he had suppressed a certain circular at the instigation of those interested in the Everglade lands. Secretary Wilson had done this, he did a great wrong, and he knew it; and it was very natural for Solicitor McCabe and the Secretary to cover up the fact and attempt to prove that he suppressed the circular for some other reason. This circular was an abstract in brief of the material features of the report which was made to Dr. Elliott by Mr. Wright and was used merely for the purpose of expediting office business. It was a sort of mimeograph letter, not for general circulation, but to use in reply to hundreds of inquirers who had written to the Department of Agriculture to secure information respecting Everglade lands. Rich land speculators had purchased land from the State of Florida by the hundreds of thousands of acres at $2 per acre and were selling them for from twenty-five to as high as sixty and seventy-five dollars per acre. Millions of pieces of literature had been sent out by them, many thousands had purchased small parcels on the installment plan, and other thousands were contemplating purchasing under these alluring representations. These were the inquirers who were writing to the department for information. Their letters came into Dr. Elliott's department. To have written each an original letter, giving the facts they desired, would have been a tedious undertaking. Consequently the circular was prepared, approved by Dr. Elliott, and sent to each inquirer with a brief letter calling their attention to the inclosure.

I will print this circular, and a casual perusal will show why those interested in the sale of Everglade lands would desire its suppression:

[United States Department of Agriculture, Office of Experiment Stations.]

DRAINAGE INVESTIGATIONS—THE EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA.

Under acts of Congress granting to the States the Federal swamp and overflowed lands within their borders the State of Florida acquired the area known as the Everglades. The tract is, roughly, 100 miles long and 40 miles wide, extending from Lake Okechobee to the southern end of the peninsula.

The reclamation and development of the Everglades has long been desired by the State, and a number of years ago some canals were excavated in the Kissimmee River Valley and west and southwest of Lake Okechobee. In 1906 the State secured the assistance of the Office of Experiment Stations, United States Department of Agriculture, and during the next two winters Drainage Investigations of that office conducted a survey and examinations, including a line of levels from Fort Myers to Lake Okechobee, south about 30 miles to Brown's store, and directly east across the Everglades to the vicinity of Pompano.

The climate of southern Florida seems as healthful as that of other localities having the same latitude. The United States Weather Bureau records from Jupiter and Fort Myers show that from 1898 to 1906, inclusive, the maximum temperature was 90° F. and the minimum 24°. The long and hot summers are usually very irksome to the people from more northern States, but do not seem detrimental to the health.

The normal annual rainfall in southern Florida is nearly 60 inches and the precipitation has reached 70 inches in a year. The wettest season is usually the months of July and August. The area of Lake Okechobee is approximately 733 square miles, and the water from seven and one-half times this area of land, lying to the north, flows into the lake. During the rainy season the lake overflows along the southern boundary. This overflow, together with the excessive rainfall upon the area, causes the swampy condition characteristic of the Everglades.

The soil of these lands consists largely of decayed and partly decayed vegetable matter, having the nature of muck or peat. This is underliked of the season of the season of the season of the season of the Glades are the "hammock lands," as they are locally known. The "hammocks" are small areas of from 1 to sometimes 10 acres, rising of 2 feet above the surrounding muck. The soil is more sa at least partially drained, but undoubtedly much this will be fore any considerable areas will be habitable or fitted for cultivation.

For the drainage of the Everglades a very complete system of main ditches and laterals will be required and farm ditches in detail. Also in this soil provision must be made for irrigation or for maintaining the water in the ditches and soil at a fairly uniform depth, not too low, in order that there may always be sufficient moisture for the production of crops and to prevent the liability of the muck catching fire and in order that there may always be sufficient moisture for the production of crops and to prevent the liability of the muck catching fire and burning.

The drainage of the Everglades is entirely feasible from an engineering standpoint, but the value of the lands when drained is still largely problematical. Some small drained tracts on the edge of the Glades have produced very satisfactory crops of vegetables. Usually, but not always, large quantities of fertilizers have been used. Several years ago sugar cane was grown on well-drained land near Kissimmee, considerably north of Lake Okechobee, and it appears that the yield of sugar should have been profitable on this plantation. On some of the hammock lands oranges and grapefruit have been raised, but for these large quantities of commercial fertilizers are almost always required.

Further information regarding the conditions in southern Florida will be issued later by the Office of Experiment Stations, United States Department of Agriculture, with an outline for the main drainage system to reclaim about 1,800,000 acres of the Everglades lying between Miami and Lake Okechobee and about the lake. Further than the preparation of such a drainage plan the National Government is doing nothing toward the drainage of the Everglades and has made no appropriation from which any such works may be constructed. The results of some preliminary investigations made near Miami in 1904 are published in Separate 9 from Office of Experiment Stations Bulletin 158. This publication and Farmers' Bulletin 238, "Citrus Fruit Growing in the Gulf States," may be obtained by addressing the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. The director of the agricultural experiment station at Gainesville, Fla., can probably furnish information regarding soils and crops. The officials having charge of the drainage work being done by the State are the board of trustees of the internal improvement fund, Tallahassee, Fla.

January, 1910.

JANUARY, 1910.

Please notice, in this connection, that I state that this circular was approved by Dr. Elliott, who was chief and scientific expert of the drainage department, and if he approved it, such approval came from the highest authority on that subject in the Department of Agriculture. The probe of the investigation centered around this circular, as the publication which had been suppressed, the full report not having been issued. To be sure an excerpt of this report was sent to Mr. Hall, of Colorado Springs, a wealthy land speculator, and also to the governor of Florida. This excerpt, by permission of the Secretary, was published in Florida, and those convenient and favorable parts which suited the land sharks were published in their literature and given prominence as the report of the United States Government and starred as a national indorsement of the whole Everglades scheme.

It is very evident that Solicitor McCabe's plan of defense was an attempt to show that Secretary Wilson never saw the circular until the day he suppressed it, and to show that the immediate cause or instigator of the suppression was not connected with the "Everglade interests." The circular was suppressed in the presence of Senator Fletcher on the 4th of February, 1910. It is a fact that influences of "Everglade interests" behind Senting Secretary Wilson was also attempting to conceal his true mo-tive for suppressing the circular behind the Senator also and bring forward a "framed-up" motive. It does not appear that Senator Fletcher himself was in any way involved other than as a medium through which the "Everglade interests" operated. The "Everglade interests" were hiding behind Senator Fletcher, and if Solicitor McCabe could show that these interests never appeared before the Secretary before Senator Fletchea's visit it might be possible to give some other reason than "Everglade interests" why the Secretary suppressed the circular. But the reasonable inference from the evidence clearly establishes the fact that "Everglade interests" came directly to the Secretary before Senator FLETCHER arrived and asked that the circular be suppressed.

In attempting to ascertain whether the Secretary did actually suppress this circular at the instigation of "Everglade interests," as was sworn to by Congressman Clark, W. R. Hardee, and Capt. Sewell, I will take the facts that are the closest to the date of and the reason for the suppression. One of the most pointed facts relating to the question of the influence of "Everglade interests" is contained in a telegram dated February 3, 1910, which was sent to the Hon. D. U. Fletcher, United States Senator from Florida, at Washington, D. C., by Gov. N. B. Broward, then governor of Florida. Gov. Broward at that time was publicly known to be the owner of many thou-sands of acres of this Everglade land, which fact he himself publicly acknowledged. This telegram is as follows:

Received a telegram, "Bulletin coming out from Agricultural Department knocking Everglades." I earnestly ask that you investigate and prevent any such action, if you can. I understand that Dr. H. W. Wiley, Chief Chemist Agricultural Department, is opposed to having his name used by companies selling Everglade land. They claim to quote Dr. Wiley's report to Secretary of Agriculture, 1891, page 170. They think they had a right to print excerpts of report, it being a public document, Am writing.

N. B. BROWARD.

Let us see if this telegram indicates any "Everglade interests" influence in the matter. First, I desire to state in justice to Senator Flercher that it does not appear that he acted in the matter other than in an intermediary capacity, and that upon receipt of a telegram from the governor of his State. Any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives receiving a telegram from the governor of his State asking him to do certain things would probably be expeditious in complying with the request. Senator Fletcher received the telegram on the 4th of February, 1910, and did act expeditiously. Note that the telegram asks him to stop a "bulletin" which was knocking the Everglades. Gov. Broward, being himself an owner of Everglade lands, naturally did not want this "bulle-tin" published. It turns out that the publication the governor referred to as a "bulletin" was a circular, and he asks that the Senator stop it.

Is there not indication of "Everglade interests" in that? Senator Fletcher went down to see the Secretary. After receiving this request from the governor, did he go there to stop the circular or not? The telegram begins by saying, "Received a telegram." Who did Gov. Broward receive this telegram a telegram." Who did Gov. Broward receive this telegram from? Was it from other "Everglade interests," who wanted the circular stopped as well as did the governor? The telegram also stated that Dr. Wiley is opposed to having his name used by companies selling. Everglade lands. In other wards the also stated that Dr. Wiley is opposed to having his name used by companies selling Everglade lands. In other words, the companies which are selling Everglade lands are in trouble with Dr. Wiley. Who told Gov. Broward that the Everglade lands sale companies were in trouble with Dr. Wiley? Was it not the Everglade sales companies themselves who told him this? The telegram states, "Am writing." The governor did write, and Senator FLETCHER received the letter. The Senator was asked to produce this letter, but declined. No one can tell, consequently, what the details of this letter might have shown respecting "Everglade interests." The Senator was asked if the letter disclosed the name of the man who wired to Gov. Broward, and he stated it did. Asked if he would furnish the name, he stated that he would, but did not.

Please remember that the date upon this telegram is part of the evidence that fixes the fact that that circular was suppressed on February 4, 1910, the day Senator Fletcher called upon the Secretary. Another evidence, indicating that it was suppressed on that day, is shown in the fact that after the 4th of February 1910, copies of letters sent to these inquirers when of February, 1910, copies of letters sent to those inquirers who kept writing to the department showed no longer any reference to "circular inclosed." As a matter of fact, everybody on both sides agrees that it was suppressed February 4, 1910.

On the morning of February 4, the Senator being in possession of this telegram, received a visit from one M. L. Bowen. M. L. It is a fact that influences of "Everglade interests" behind Senator Fletcher, and from other sources, were active in securing the suppression of this circular. It appears very plainly that while "Everglade interests" were hiding behind the Senator that not a remarkable coincidence that he happened to appear in the Senator's office with the circular about the same time the Senator received the telegram? M. L. Bowen represents another indication of the "Everglades interests" activity in securing the suppression of this circular. Did M. L. Bowen telegraph Gov. Broward about this circular? Or did Bowen telegraph his headquarters at Chicago and they in turn telegraph the governor? One point here is worth remembering also. This circular had been used for some time prior to February 3 to answer inquirers. "Everglade interests" certainly knew that it was out before February 3. This circular threw the whole Everglade crowd up in the air, and they were busy telegraphing, writing, and trying to stop it. That must have taken some time before they finally got Senator Fletcher in action on February 4. That fact is worth remembering in connection with the testimony and conduct of a Mr. Will and another man by the name of Howe, both of whom were connected with "Everglade interests."

On the morning of the 4th of February, 1910, Senator Fletcher took the circular given to him by M. L. Bowen and called upon Secretary Wilson. This circular, although a fair and honest abstract of the whole report as to all matters referred to in it, contains statements which were positively injurious to the "Everglade interests," and upon the face of it is evidence that they were desirous of having it stopped.

It is difficult to ascertain from the testimony what happened when Senator Fletcher called on Secretary Wilson. The Secretary says that the Senator did not ask him to suppress it. He says also that the Senator did not discuss the circular. He can not remember that Senator Fletcher showed him Gov. Broward's telegram, but the Senator is inclined to think he did show it to him. If the Secretary saw that telegram, how is it possible that he did not know that "Everglade interests" were demanding the suppression of this circular? If you had gone down there with a like message, would you not have shown to the Secretary a telegram from a man so high in authority as the governor of Florida? Whatever else happened, it is agreed that the Senator gave the circular to the Secretary. The Secrethat the Senator gave the circular to the Secretary. The Secretary pressed a button at his desk, and Mr. Arnold came in. Mr. Arnold, as respects department publications, is the man who stands next to the Secretary in authority. In Mr. Arnold's stands next to the Secretary in authority. In Mr. Arnold's close relation to the Secretary, how was it that he had never called the attention of the Secretary to this circular before? The Secretary immediately directed Mr. Arnold to have the thing discontinued, saying, according to Senator Fletcher's testimony, "This is not part of our business; we are here to furnish scientific data and the result of scientific investigation, In almost a moment's time he emphatically directed Mr. Arnold to stop the circular. Now, how did the Secretary know this was not scientific data, if that is the real reason why this circular was suppressed? Of course, Solicitor McCabe's defense, aiming to disprove the statement that the Secretary suppressed the circular at the instigation of the "Everglade interests," it would be quite natural to give some other reason. In support of this other reason the Secretary must say that the circular was not scientific, and, as he intimated in his testimony, crude.

If that is the real reason why he suppressed this circular, how could the Secretary know on such a brief examination that the circular was crude and unscientific? Why did he not send for Dr. Elliott, who is the foremost drainage expert in the world, and who approved this circular? Dr. Elliott is recognized as an authority on drainage in this country and abroad. He is referred to as such in the Encyclopedia Britannica, and his textbooks are used in many colleges and universities throughout this country and others. How was Secretary Wilson to know so quickly that this circular was crude and unscientific? There are many scientific subjects treated in the Department of Agriculture, by specialists employed for that purpose. Does Secretary Wilson embody within himself all such special scientific knowledge that he is enabled to pass judgment on these matters so quickly without consulting the educated men of the departments? Is it not a very transparent fact that this "crude and unscientific" reason for the suppression of this circular is a sham, and was trumped up merely for the purpose of trying to disprove the statements made by W. R. Hardee, Capt. Sewell, and Congressman Clark, that the Secretary suppressed it at the instigation of those interested in the Everglades? The Secretary infers that W. R. Hardee, Capt. Sewell, and Congressman Clark lied, and that their testimony was a product of collusion. Will anybody in this House believe this of Congressman Clark, who has for many years labored in behalf of his constituents and the country as a courageous, efficient, and honorable public servant? Clark had no interest in lying, and I defy anybody to show any such, either personal or political. Why should W. R. Hardee lie about it? Hardee's testimony was straight from the shoulder, unequivocal, and neither he nor Capt. Sewell had the remotest interest in the subject. They are men of the highest standing and the best reputation for honesty and integrity in the community where they reside

Here are three good men and true, who swore that the Secretary of Agriculture did say that he suppressed the circular at the instigation of "Everglades interests," and I think it is very plain that he did say it, and that at that time he did tell the truth, but afterwards repented having told the truth. The Secretary states that on the 4th of February, 1910, the day Senator Fletcher called, was the first time he had seen that circular. The Everglades project was a big subject. It was not one of those small matters that might pass through the department unnoticed by the biggest men in it. It was talked about and discussed generally by all hands from the Drainage Department up to the Secretary. But it is plain that if the Secretary had been familiar with that circular before that 4th of February Solicitor McCabe's defense would fall. If the Secretary had been familiar with the circular before that, while it was being sent out, he could not have risen in his wrath and denounced it as unscientific, as it is alleged he did.

Strange testimony was given by a man by the name of Will. This man's testimony is shifty, equivocal, and abounding in terms employed by that character of witness who feels himself treading upon unsafe ground. Read it over and see for yourself if this is not true. Let us look at this testimony self if this is not true. Let us look at this testimony.

Will swore that a Mr. Howe, who was an Everglades lands salesman, came to him and showed him this circular. Howe was indignant because the circular was a knock on the Everglades, and he and Will talked the circular over for an hour, and then they both went to the Department of Agriculture. Will states that he was interested in Everglades as a buyer, but hypocritically avers that he had not yet been convinced regarding its virtues sufficiently enough to be a seller of it. In other words, he states that he liked the land well enough to buy it himself, but in his superlative goodness had not yet learned enough about it to start in and sell it to others.

Both he and Howe, then, were interested in Everglade lands when they called at the department and saw Dr. True, Dr. Arnold, and Dr. C. G. Elliott. Will swears that Howe boldly and aggressively demanded of Dr. True and Dr. Elliott the suppression of that circular. Both Dr. True and Dr. Elliott the suppression of the circular and discourteous, and told them that if they did not suppress it he would go to Secretary Wilson. Will swears that the day on which they called at the department was the 7th or 8th of February, 1910. As I have already shown, everybody agrees that the circular was suppressed on the 4th of February, 1910.

Dr. True and Dr. Elliott refused to suppress the circular on Howe's demand, and then on the same day, and very shortly after they had been "bold and aggressive" with Dr. True and Dr. Elliott in their demand to have the circular suppressed, they did go to see Secretary Wilson. But Will swears and Secretary Wilson swears that when they were in his presence on that visit the circular was not mentioned. They were "bold and aggressive" in demanding of Dr. Elliott and Dr. True that the circular should be suppressed, and in that frame of mind they went to Secretary Wilson, as they had threatened to do. But when they got to him, according to the testimony, they did not even mention the circular, which Howe said had already lost him $20,000. Howe must have taken his loss lightly to have forgotten it as soon as he came in the presence of the Secretary.

If there is anything sure on this earth, it is that Will and Howe called on Dr. True and Dr. Elliott before that circular was suppressed—before February 4, 1910—and they did not call on them on February 7 or 8, 1910. The order had come through from Secretary Wilson on the 4th of February, 1910, to Dr. True and Dr. Elliott to suppress the circular, and they had suppressed it.

Who can believe that if Will and Howe called on them on the 7th or 8th of February and made demand that the circular be suppressed that either Dr. True or Dr. Elliott would not have told them that it had been suppressed? But what is the reason that Solicitor McCabe tried to make it appear that Will and Howe came on the 7th or 8th of February instead of before the 4th of February?

The reason is that had it appeared that they visited the Secretary before he had suppressed the circular it would have been strong inference that he did it at the instigation of those who were interested in Everglade lands and not because it was crude and unscientific. Both Will and Howe were representing Everglade interests, and if it was shown that they called on the Secretary before the circular was suppressed it would have been a corroborative fact to support the statement made by Congressman Clark, W. R. Hardee, and Capt. Sewell. It is absurd to assume that Will and Howe did not call upon the Secretary before February 4, and it is absurd to assume that, in their frame of mind, they did not mention the circular to him during that visit.

Whether the Secretary stated that he was not running the department for the protection of fools who did not know any better than to buy land they had not seen, or not, is not particularly material, but the fact is that after the circular was suppressed the Secretary sent out another kind of a letter to inquirers. In this he expressed it as "his judgment, no one should invest money in land without seeing it first." Congressman Clark, W. R. Hardee, and Capt. Sewell aver that the Secretary did say so, and it is evident from his opinion expressed in this letter that his mind dwelt upon thoughts of this character.

But after the Secretary had suppressed the circular letter on the alleged grounds that it was "crude and unscientific," let us loook at and consider the letter he himself sent out and see whether there is anything crude and unscientific about that. In this letter he told inquirers that the department had "no publication regarding these lands." The department had expended the people's money to get information about the Ever-This information was given to land speculators and to the State of Florida, but the Secretary suppressed the circular and then wrote to inquirers, telling them that the department had no "publication," notwithstanding that it was in possession of the entire report at that moment. The word "publication" is a subterfuge and a mere evasion. The circular was to all intents and purposes a publication, but he had suppressed it. The circular gave the people some facts; but what did the letter give them which he wrote after he had suppressed the circular? It told them, those who inquired, to ask the trustees of the in-ternal improvement fund, at Tallahassee, Fla., for information. These trustees have entire charge of the Everglades project, and I do not intend to reflect in any manner upon them. They had sold for the State a large quantity of land to R. H. Bolles, who was the man with big money behind several of these Everglades sales companies. During the investigation former Everglades sales companies. During the investigation former Attorney General Ellis, of Florida, represented this board of trustees, and on inquiry informed the committee that he not only represented them, but he represented also R. J. Bolles, the big chief exploiter of Everglades. He also stated that at the time he became attorney for the trustees he told them he was Bolles's attorney and that the trustees did not object to it. These trustees had a contract in behalf of the State as one of the parties and Bolles as the other, and they consented that Gen. Ellis should be attorney for both. This illustrates very plainly the communion of interests between the board of trustees of the internal improvement fund and the Everglades lands promoters. Gen. Ellis explained that the State's interests were bound up with the Everglades promoters, because if these promoters succeeded in selling large quantities of their lands and colonizing them it would increase the value of the State land. Now, there is where the "joke" appears in the Secretary's

He refers all inquirers to this board of trustees. In other words, he suppresses information direct from the scientists of this great Agricultural Department, and tells the inquirers to get it from the board of trustees, and the board of trustees turns the letters of the inquirers over to the Everglades sales speculators, because the State is interested in seeing them succeed. Then the land speculators write to the inquirers for the purpose of selling their land, all of which, boiled down, means that Secretary Wilson turned these inquirers over to the tender mercy of "Everglade interests." That is not "crude and unscientific," is it? That is another of the Secretary's jokes, which is side-splitting humor, indeed.

Now, I desire to speak, before closing, of another Agricultural Department joke. I will call this the "Juggernaut joke." A case where faithful, loyal employees are beset by the tyranny and persecution of those who manipulate a contemptible bureaucracy. This is the case of Dr. C. G. Elliott and Mr. A. D. Morehouse. When it appeared that this investigation was im-Morehouse. minent the department began to prepare its defense. intimated to C. G. Elliott that he would be the goat, and he was ordered to produce every scrap of information bearing upon this Everglades report and deliver it to Solicitor McCabe. After he had obeyed this order, and he himself was possessed of no correspondence bearing upon the subject, he and his assistant, Mr. Morehouse, were summarily dismissed. The real reason why they were discharged was the same reason why Glavis and Kirby, of the Ballinger case, were discharged, namely, to get them out of the way and out of reach of any fact that they might produce to sustain their own contentions and prove that some one higher up was culpable. That was the real reason, but it was not the reason that Solicitor McCabe succeeded in resurrecting from the years gone by.

J. O. Wright, above referred to, had left the Agricultural Department and had taken employment at more than twice his Government salary from the trustees of the internal improve-ment fund of the State of Florida. Dr. Elliott had seen fit, for apparent good reasons, to revise Wright's report. His revision was not suitable to Wright's employers. And in the controversy that arose because of this revision and the incidental withholding from publication of Wright's report, as submitted by him, Dr. Elliott incurred the antagonism of all Everglade promoters. Wright's report was highly colored and favorable in many respects to the business of selling Everglades, while Dr. Elliott's revision was scientific and would not serve as an advertisement for the Everglade promoters. Dr. Elliott, thus having incurred the antagonism of Everglade promoters and the hatred of Wright, the investigation being imminent, the Secretary, instead of taking that side of the question represented by his expert in the drainage department, found it desirable to get rid of Elliott and his assistant, Morehouse, who knew too much about the facts that would be brought out in the coming investigation. It was also desirable to do something to them that would frighten them into silence and to hang over their heads a threat of revenge if they attempted to tell the truth. They were accused of falsifying the accounts of the department. The case was taken before the grand jury at the instigation of Solicitor McCabe—the same McCabe in the Wiley case—and they were indicted. McCabe went back in the records three years and took up a technical charge against them wherein the Government stood to lose nothing and the accused stood to make not one cent.

The charge grew out of the appropriation made for the purpose of carrying on the departments of drainage and irrigation investigations. That was in 1909, which was the last year that these two separate subjects, or divisions, were cared for in one appropriation, and which method of appropriation was alone responsible for the condition resulting in alleged falsification of accounts. Dr. Elliott went west on a business trip, leaving a safe balance for drainage and enough to care for all outstanding obligations, with surplus to turn back into the Treasury. During his absence bills incurred by irrigation were dumped onto the doctor's drainage account, leaving him with a deficit. This was a mere juggling of bookkeeping, and if there was to be a deficit the irrigation side of the accounts should have taken it. Dr. Elliott had nothing to do with this book deficit, neither had his assistant, Mr. Morehouse, anything to do with it. But they had incurred Solicitor McCabe's and Secretary Wilson's displeasure, and the technical charge was found a very convenient method by which to get rid of them and punish them for telling the truth about the Everglades scandal. There was no intent on the part of Dr. Elliott or of Dr. Morehouse to make a cent, and there was no chance for the Government to lose a cent. That same scheme has been going on in the Government for many years. I do not uphold it, and it was an irregularity. But I say this, that Solicitor McCabe knew at that time of many other such instances, and if he could rise in his official capacity and rush forward the prosecution of those who had "falsified" accounts in that manner in these cases, why did he not arise in his wrath and do so also in the other cases?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATH-RICK] is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, the papers of this country have spread abroad the news that as a result of this investigation these two men have been indicted. The indictment is not a result of the investigation, but it is the result of the operation of the steam roller by autocratic tyrants in the Department of Agriculture. That is what it is the result of.

Understand, neither Elliott nor Morehouse could have made a cent, neither could the Government lose a cent, by the transaction, but it was a technical violation of the law; and I say to you that this thing has been going on in some departments of the Government for many years. I do not defend the practice, but if Elliott and Morehouse are to be ground to atoms in the cogs of this tyrannical bureaucratic machine I will do the very best I know how to see that some other people are given opportunity for explanation on the same count, and how high up in the Agriculture Department it will reach will remain to be seen.

Dr. Elliott is 62 years old, a quiet, inoffensive, unobtrusive, studious, scientific man, wedded to his occupation, loyal to his country, and beloved by all who know him. His sweet, loving wife came to me weeping, bowed down with this burden that has been placed upon them, and begged that I should tell the truth about this affair. They did not fear the truth; but in the operation of this contemptible persecution these old people, deprived of the salary that the department has been paying the doctor for years, have been obliged to draw upon their slender resources for the purpose of defraying the unusual expenses of collating evidence and preparing to defend themselves against this unrighteous charge and save their honor. The newspapers of this country have not known the story. If they have, they have not printed it. The word has gone out that the findings of this investigation resulted in the indictment of these two men. Dr. Elliott, like Dr. Wiley, was an ornament to the Department of Agriculture, but was obnoxious to the autocrats who stand at the throttle of the department steam roller.

The leakage from this department of cotton-crop reports a few years ago, the investigation of the department in the Wiley case, wherein a beneficent law, intended to protect the people of this country against poisonous food, was shown to be emas-culated and destroyed by the Secretary—up to this time the management of this department has been a scandal and a dis-

Only as short a time ago as March there was before the department consideration of the interstate shipment of doctored grain, grain that had been sulphurized for the purpose of concealing its quality and making it appear as of a higher grade. Now, what happened? Dr. Galloway, Secretary Wilson, and Dr. Wiley discussed what should be the procedure of the department in the matter. Finally Secretary quested Dr. Wiley to prepare a food-inspection decision pro-hibiting the shipment of this moldy chemicalized grain. Dr. Wiley ordered Dr. Doolittle to proceed to draw the decision, but before this decision was drawn or could be put into effect there was a meeting of the National Grain Dealers' Association at Washington at the Willard Hotel. The report of the proceedings of the meeting of the association carries the statement that Messrs. Wayne and Cornelius, who called on Secretary Wilson, gave out a memorandum of the interview, which states:

Secretary Wilson stated that the matter of seizure of grain out of condition had not as yet been called to his attention, and that he did not propose having any seizures made until he had had time to thoroughly investigate the matter himself.

This in face of the fact that, as above stated, he had only a few days before that had the conference with Dr. Wiley and Dr. Galloway, Mr. Reese and Assistant Secretary Hays being present part of the time. The Secretary said it had not yet come to his attention. Who lied? After the interview with Mr. Wayne and Mr. Cornelius the Secretary ordered the agreed-upon decision withdrawn.

That was the last straw, and Dr. Wiley resigned. Prior to this there had been another case respecting the sulphurization of dried fruit from California. The use of this class of preservative in dried fruits was a questionable process, and the department had decided to stop it, but a great cry went up from the growers and driers in California.

Secretary Wilson made a trip West, asserting that he went there for the purpose of looking into the question of forest reserves, but while there he saw the California fruit men and yielded to their expostulations and made arrangements whereby they could continue shipping the chemicalized fruit.

Secretary Wilson has been wondrous kind to the food dopers. He was kind to the fruit dealers who sulphurized their products. He was kind to the shippers of moldy grain, against the advice of his scientists, and reversed his own decision in the matter.

He was kind to the "Everglade interests" when he took the scientific information which the people had paid for away from them and turned all the home-seeker inquirers of this country over to the tender mercy of the land sharks of Florida.

In his testimony he says we should always be kind to young men, but he sanctioned the contemptible outrage of the persecution and discharge of Morehouse. He was kind to the big land speculator Hall, of Colorado Springs; he was kind to Senator Fletcher when he asked him to suppress the circular; he was kind to the trustees of the internal-improvement fund of Florida when they asked him for an excerpt of the report; but he was not kind to the people of this country when they asked him for the information which the department had gathered.

Mr. Chairman, like the pest of Sinbad the Sailor, this old man sits astride the shoulders of the people's rights, weighing down justice, obstructing the operation of laws intended to protect the people, and uncertain in his course of management of the expenditure of over sixteen millions annually of the people's money, he shifts from one decision to another at the beck and call particularly of the big interests of this country.

I say to you that Secretary Wilson, in spite of what he may have done, is to-day a veritable barnacle on the side of the ship of state.

In private business men of advanced years voluntarily retire from active conduct of business affairs, actuated by self-interest and chance of self-harm that may come from mismanagement. But the Secretary seems not amenable to this sound reasoning in Government business.

Mismanagement does not harm him. He can stick until he is 100 years old, and it does not harm him; but it does harm the people of the United States, and I say that department smells to high heaven, and some strong, Herculean arm ought to reach down and clean it out. [Applause on the Democratic side. l

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to use any time?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not care to use any time, but I should like to make one suggestion to the gentleman who has just taken his seat

Mr. BATHRICK. All right, sir.
Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it makes any difference whether Secretary Wilson is 82 or 75, but I notice the Congressional Directory says he is 77 years old.

Mr. BATHRICK. I am very glad to hear that, and thank the gentleman for the correction. I do not think it makes any difference either, as regards the conduct of the department, the way he is managing it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]. [Applause.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to that part of the bill which relates to the parcel post.

The existing law provides for a very limited parcel post, in which the weight limit is 4 pounds and the postage rate is 16 cents a pound. The pending bill raises that weight limit to 11 pounds and reduces the rate of postage from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound. It also adds a rural parcel post, by which, for the rates therein named and within the limit of 11 pounds, parcels of merchandise may be carried from any point to any other point on a rural route but not beyond.

These changes in the proposed law raise several very interesting and to me very difficult questions. Whether the weight limit should be more or less than 11 pounds, whether the rate of postage should be the same for all distances or graded, whether the rate of postage should be more or less than 12 cents a pound, and whether the rural parcel post should be so connected with the mail as to limit the carriage and delivery of parcels received on the rural route to points on the same route, or so as to provide for their carriage and delivery at any point within the United States, are some of the questions which have excited the deepest interest and developed the most radical differences of opinion.

On the one hand, the advocates of this measure claim that if these questions are answered in accordance with their views, and the terms of the law made accordingly, it will solve all of our industrial troubles and insure universal prosperity.

Some people who do not even profess to understand the parcel post claim that it will do a great deal of good. One witness before the Post Office Committee stated that he and a large number of citizens he represented did not understand the parcel post and did not see how it was going to benefit them, but still he said it was very clear in their minds that it would do a great deal of good and that they all wanted it.

On the other hand, the opponents of the measure vehemently protest against any sort of parcel post, without any reference to the weight limit or the rate of postage, and ignoring the fact that we now have a limited parcel post, they declare that the very worst consequences will result from its maintenance. They denounce the carrying of parcels of merchandise through the mail as populistic and socialistic, and almost in the same breath they tell us that it is a scheme to concentrate the wealth of the country in a few urban centers and to promote the fortunes of the great mail-order houses in the large cities. However, no one has yet explained the logical connection between populism and socialism on the one hand and the con-centration of wealth and enrichment of Montgomery Ward & Co. and Sears, Roebuck & Co. on the other. But they confidently foretell that the establishment and maintenance of a parcel post will ruin and drive out of business the country merchant, will dispense with the services of 600,000 traveling men, and leave the poor farmer a helpless victim at the mercy of the great catalogue houses of the large cities.

Among all these objections it is strange that not a word of complaint can be heard from the great express companies, who are really the persons and the only persons to be injured and put out of business. This leads one to suspect that in some way the arguments of these threatened corporations have found expression in the writings, the speeches, and the testimony of others who have been led to believe that they and not the express companies will be the victims of the parcel post.

The separation of the people into two such classes, marked by such radical and violent differences of opinion, makes it plain that nothing less than a solution absolutely correct will give popular satisfaction and that no ineffective compromise, however plausible, will be acceptable.

In order to ascertain the truth of the questions presented and to discover the correct solution of the problem, it seems to me necessary that we should consider the elements of those conditions on which the proposed law is to operate and to inquire how and to what extent we may expect bad or good results.

Now, the question of a parcel post manifestly relates to the subject of transportation, and the chief function of transportation is the interchange and distribution among the people of the products of the farm and the factory. On the one hand, we have the annual crops of American wealth, consisting of 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn, more than half a billion bushels of wheat, 16,000,000 bales of cotton, and other vegetable and animal wealth aggregating in value the sum of $9,000,000,000. The magnitude of this annual production of agricultural wealth is too great for any accurate mental measurement, and for want of a more precise conception its greatness may be compared to those great mountains which, marking the western border of the continent, look down with wonder and pride upon that great valley in which this marvelous wealth is

On the other hand, we have our manufactures, issuing from thousands of factories, consisting of almost every article fit for human use, and amounting in the aggregate to the value of $16,000,000,000 per annum. The minds which plan and direct the creation of all this wealth can hardly conceive its extent, and, in order to portray and emphasize its magnitude, I will compare it also to that great mountain range which skirts the eastern border of the continent from Canada to the far South and pillows its huge head upon the clouds while it listens to the music of the machinery hum and the industrial songs of American factories. [Applause.]

Now, the transportation of these products of the farms and the factory to the points of their consumption and their distribution among the people is the work of commerce. The aim of every steamboat, railroad company, of the banker, and the merchant, and of all others engaged in commerce is to effect this interchange and distribution.

The freights, discounts, dividends, profits, amounting to billions of dollars, constitute the price which agriculture and manufactures pay to commerce for its services in the distribution of their products. The production of all this wealth and its interchange and distribution is the business of the world, and the most important function of commerce is that of transportation. Without transportation there can be practically no production of wealth, for it is inconceivable that the farmer can till his land and make his product, his crops, without many articles that must come from the factory. Nor can any factory operate for a day without the products of the farm. And even if without transportation we could conceive of the existence of these vast products of the farm and factory, which I have already described, yet if each farmer had to use on his farm all that he produces, and if he could not dispose of the surplus that he does not need, and if no factory could use its products except to supply the wants of those who operate that factory, business would be paralyzed and civilized life would If the surplus products of the farm and the factory could not be transported to the points of their consumption, stagnation and ruin would be the result. The absolute necessity, therefore, for the transportation of the entire surplus of the products of the farm and factory can not be denied; and if the inability or failure to transport and distribute the entire surplus products of the farm and the factory would mean complete business ruin, then it follows necessarily that the failure or inability to transport any part of this surplus product of the factory and the farm is, pro tanto, a public detriment, and in the truth of that proposition lies the necessity for a parcel post [applause], for without it a large part of American wealth must be wasted, because it can not be distributed.

The transportation problem has been committed mostly to the express and railroad companies and those corporations interested only in the profits of the business have signally failed to solve the problem, and that failure creates the necessity that the Government should take action through a parcel post,

All merchandise, so far as it is the subject of transportation, may be divided into two classes. The first class consists of large quantities and is produced, bought, and sold by wholesale and transported as freight in carload lots, or at least in lots whose weight exceeds 100 pounds. This class of merchandise is the subject of trade among the wealthier classes and, amounting to more than a billion tons per annum, it is conveyed as freight from the points of production to the centers of trade throughout the country, whence it finds its way on wagons to the country merchant.

The other class consists of small quantities produced mostly by farmers of small capital, doing a small business, and called parcels. While the first class amounts to more than a billion tons per annum, the amount of this second class seems to be unknown and can not be accurately estimated, except that it must exceed four and a half million tons a year, which, I believe, is the weight of that portion that is handled by the express companies. Between these two classes of merchandise there is an unjust and a flagrant discrimination in rates by the railroad and express companies in favor of the rich and against the poor, on account of which discrimination the transportation of this class of merchandise is either prohibited or reduced to a minimum, and this discrimination is the joint act of the railroad company and the express company. According to the regulations of the railroad companies they charge the same freight on all parcels of merchandise shipped as freight that do not exceed in weight 100 pounds, so that the shipment of 10 pounds of freight pays just 10 times as high a rate per pound as a shipment of 100 pounds or more. This discrimination debars small shipments of merchandise from being transported as fregilt and drives them into the express.

But we find that the express company and the railroad company have entered into a contract by which the express company has bound itself never to charge less than 150 per cent of the rate charged by the railroad company on shipments of the same goods in larger quantities, and in actual practice the express company collects from the people more than 16 times as high a rate on the shipment of merchandise in small parcels as the railroad company collects on the same goods shipped in larger quantities. The express company makes no charge less than 25 cents, so that if your parcel is worth only 25 cents, you must pay the full value of it in order to have it transported; and on all parcels destined to go a long distance the express rates are so high as to be prohibitive. These discriminations make it impossible for any merchandise bought and transported in small quantities to be sold in competition with merchandise bought and transported in carload lots, and either prohibits the importation of these parcels or reduces them to a minimum, down to where the condition of the shipper is such that the rate is immaterial to him. Now, this discrimination against the small parcel and this prohibition against the transportation of merchandise in small quantities is a fact, or one of the facts, which not only justifies but necessitates a parcel post by the Government, and if this discrimination against the small parcels, if this prohibition against the transportation of parcels of merchandise weighing less than 100 pounds, is the evil to be remedied, then the remedy should be coextensive with the evil and the weight limit should be raised not from 4 to 11 pounds as provided in this bill, but from 4 to 100 pounds as demanded by the very conditions which call for any parcel post at all. [Applause.]

This discrimination either exists or it does not exist. If it does not exist, if the railroad and express companies do now carry merchandise in small parcels at reasonable rates and without any discrimination, if they do that, then there is no excuse for any parcel post at all, and the weight limit should not only not be raised from 4 to 11 pounds, but the law with reference to any parcels at all should be repealed. But if this discrimination does exist, if the railroad and express rates on merchandise shipped in small parcels is so high and exorbitant as to consume all the profits of the production of such merchandise, then the Government in providing a parcel post should fix the weight limit so as to embrace all parcels that can not profitably be sent by rail or express, and this applies as forcibly to the 100-pound parcel as it does to the 11-pound parcel. There is no reason that I can see why parcels weighing 11 pounds and under should be received in the mails and those weighing 11 pounds and over should be excluded. If the Government undertakes the business of carrying parcels on the ground that the railroad and express companies have failed to handle the business satisfactorily, then manifestly in logic it must provide for the handling of all parcels which those corporations have failed to handle satisfactorily, and that includes 100 pounds just as well as it does 11 pounds. And so I submit that the—
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does that include the 250-pound parcel as well as the 100?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No, sir. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Why not? Mr. WITHERSPOON. For the very reason I have already explained. I do not understand there is any discrimination by the railroad company against the 250-pound parcel.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that the definite point of discrimination is at 100 pounds? Mr. WITHERSPOON. I understand that that is the regulation of the railroad company and that it draws a distinction in rates between 100 pounds and over. Now, the second reason-

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will.

Mr. WILLIS. I am very much interested in the gentleman's scholarly presentation of this subject, and I would like to know the gentleman's plan for carrying this into effect. Would it be by taking it from the express companies-or perhaps the gentleman is coming to that?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will get to that after awhile. I can not discuss but one thing at a time. Now, the second argument I want to present to the committee is that the parcel post should be established because the railroads and express companies do not even pretend to extend the benefits of the service of transportation to the rural population. The fact is these corporations have never recognized the existence of the country at all, but they confine all their efforts and activities to the people living in the towns and cities. I submit that the country people have the same right and should have the same opportunity to have the products of their labor transported to the point of consumption as the people in the towns and cities, but this right has never been taken into consideration in the solution of the transportation problem. The farmer must transport in the best way he can the produce of his farm to some trading center before the railroad company and the express company will touch it. Now, as to corn, cotton, wheat, and other articles that are produced in large quantities and are bulky, the farmer can transport them to market as cheaply, perhaps more cheaply, than the Government can do it for him, and therefore he is not damaged by the failure of these corporations to take such articles at his farm; but on every farm there are numerous products, such as eggs, fowls, vegetables, and fruits, which are produced on such a small scale that after satisfying the wants of the farmer's family the surplus left is so small that the farmer can not afford to transport them to the market, and hence they are wasted.

Now, if the farmer knew that ample means were provided for the transportation of such merchandise to market at a reasonable price it would stimulate and increase the production of this kind of wealth, which could always be done without additional capital by utilizing labor which otherwise would be idle, and thus the wealth of the country would be increased. These by-products of the farm would often constitute and measure the farmer's profit and at the same time satisfy the wants and decrease the cost of living to the people in the town.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?
Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLACKMON. Is it the gentleman's idea of parcel post that it will be required to carry poultry and eggs?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, yes. I do not care to discuss

Mr. BLACKMON. I want to ask you a question.
Mr. WITHERSPOON. I want to discuss what I consider are the principles involved in this question.
Mr. BLACKMON. The gentleman declines to yield to my question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I have yielded to your question.

Mr. BLACKMON. Are you in favor of a parcel post that would take a hundred pounds of poultry or of eggs through the mails with the facilities we now have?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will answer the gentleman's question and say yes; and anything else that is good for the consumer in the city and that will give a profit to the farmer by benefiting the country. That is what I want.

Mr. BLACKMON. I would just like to ask another question. Is the gentleman in favor of maintaining a rural route such as we now have?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Why, certainly I am.

Mr. BLACKMON. And do you think with a provision of the kind you suggest you can maintain the present rural routes and extend other rural routes?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I think so. That is a question on which I am not an expert, and I did not propose to enlighten this committee on that. I just wanted to discuss certain general principles that I think underlie what would be a proper parcel post. I was discussing the failure of the railroad and express companies to afford any facilities for the rural population. The fact that they do not recognize the possibility of this great increase in the production of wealth and provide for its transportation shows that the railroad and express business of the country is founded in ignorance of or indifference to the needs of the rural population, amounting to 40,000,000 people, and that very failure is one of the facts that I think necessitates a parcel post, and if their failure to provide for the transportation to market of this class of merchandise produced on the farm is the necessity for a parcel post, then manifestly that necessity embraces parcels of 100 pounds just as much as it embraces parcels of 11 pounds. If the inability or failure of the transportation companies to take care of the agricultural products existing in such small quantities that the farmer can not afford to carry them to market necessitates a parcel post, then manifestly the very necessity or reason why parcels of 11 pounds or under should be carried in the mails would apply with equal force to parcels weighing more than 11 pounds up to the point when the farmer could afford to provide his own transportation, which would be not less than 100 pounds, for it would be an economic waste for him to devote his own time and his wagon and team to the transportation to market of less than a In this second reason or necessity for a parcel post there is nothing that makes 11 pounds a reasonable limit to the admission and exclusion of parcels from the mails.

The third reason I submit to the committee why a parcel post should be now established, and that it should include parcels of 100 pounds, is that the Government is now the only one that conduct that business at a profit. Having taken up the parcels business so far as all those parcels that are embraced in what is known as the first, second, and third class mail are concerned, which, on account of their bulk, their size and weight, and high relative value, are the most profitable part of the business, the Government has rendered it impossible for any private person to conduct the business of transporting other classes of parcels at a profit. While the Government has made it impossible for anyone else to conduct this business profitably, the facilities already provided by the Government for the transportation of parcels embraced in the first three classes of mail will enable the Government to transport parcels of merchandise in many cases without any increase in the cost, and in no case with a proportionate increase in the cost.

Now, to illustrate: When the Government has provided a mail car on the train or a wagon on a rural route and that car or wagon is half filled with mail of the first, second, and third classes, manifestly it would cost absolutely nothing more to fill up the car or the wagon with parcels of merchandise. And in all those cases where the carriage of parcels of merchandise would necessitate procuring more space in the car or procuring a larger wagon, or an additional animal to draw the wagon, the increase in the cost would not be proportional to the increase in the revenue. So that, the Government having taken charge of so much of the parcel-transportation business as yields in revenue $237,000,000 per annum and rendered it impossible for anyone else to conduct this business profitably, and having already incurred a large part, if not the principal part, of the cost necessary and incident to the conduct of the business, there is an imperative demand that it should carry for the people their parcels of merchandise. [Applause.]
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman a question or two there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You know the Government now carries at a very great loss second-class mail matter?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do not know that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, the department thinks it

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; and I think the department does not know what it is talking about when it says so.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That may be, but the best statisticians and experts in the United States who have passed upon it think so. Whether it is so or not, I am not able to say; but I am assuming that it is so from the evidence that is before the committee and the country. I just wanted to ask the gentle-man a question leading to that. At what figure does the gen-tleman think we could afford to carry fourth-class mail matter and not incur a loss in its carriage?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. coming to that directly. I am discussing a different thing right If anybody has a question to ask, I would prefer that he ask it about what I am discussing, and if he wishes to ask about some other matter I would prefer that he wait until I get to that. I can not mix up things. I am now discussing another matter.

The Government having rendered it impossible for another to carry on the business, having taken over that portion of the parcel-transportation business which yields in revenue to the Government $237,000,000 in a year, and the most profitable part of it, and therefore having made it impossible for any private enterprise to conduct the business, I say the demand that the Government should do it all is now imperative.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Government has taken over all the matter over 4 pounds in weight?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No, sir. I said all the parcel business; and what I mean by parcel business is periodicals and newspapers and books and all other things constituting the first, second, and third classes of mail matter, because they are nothing but parcels. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But it is the fourth-class matter that we now have under discussion.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I know; but the Government has taken the other parcels, and I now say it should take them all; it ought to take them all.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.
Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman know that the express companies carry a large amount of what would otherwise be second-class mail-papers and periodicals?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That is my information; and if that is true, they do it in violation of the law, in my estimation.

Mr. WEEKS. Some of the large publishing companies transport the bulk of their publications in that way.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I understand; and I say it is in violation of the law, and they ought to be stopped from doing it.

Having created the necessity that it should carry parcels of merchandise, the necessity exists as to parcels exceeding 11 pounds in weight just the same as to parcels of less weight. Indeed, when the Government undertakes to carry parcels weighing as much as 11 pounds, as proposed in the bill, then the necessity for its carriage of all parcels up to 100 pounds in weight becomes imperative, because the impossibility of a private person or corporation handling parcels which exceed 11 pounds in weight, while the Government takes all parcels up to 11 pounds, is manifest. No good reason can be given why the mails should be open to parcels of 11 pounds and closed to those of greater weight. If the fact that the Government alone can profitably conduct the transportation of parcels demands the parcel post, then the demand embraces all parcels up to 100 pounds.

Now, resuming, whether you regard this discrimination against the small parcel or this failure of the express and railroad companies to extend their services to the rural population or the fact that the Government alone can now profitably carry on this business; whether you regard any one of these, or all of them combined, as the reason or the necessity for a parcel post, I say that there is nothing in any one of these reasons, nor is there anything in all three of them combined, that gives any sort of support to the distinction made by this bill that the Government should receive parcels weighing as much as 11 pounds and should not receive any weighing over 11 pounds.

I desire now to call the attention of the committee to the question whether or not the postage rate on parcels should be the same for all distances, or should be graded. This bill proposes a flat rate. According to the provisions of the bill a parcel can be carried for the same postage, whether it is to go 10 miles or 4,000 miles. In thus adopting a flat rate, I submit that the committee is clearly right, and I hope they will be sustained, for several reasons.

The first reason is that the flat rate is the one generally adopted in foreign countries, where the parcel post has been in existence for many years, and the experience of those countries, in which, after many years' trial, no one has ever found any reason why the flat rate should be abandoned, is a reasonable assurance of its value. It is also in line with our own policy with regard to the first, second, and third classes of mail and in regard to the 4-pound parcel, which we have provided for heretofore. All of these can be carried any distance for the same amount of postage.

The flat rate is also in line with the contract made between the United Kingdom and the American Express Co., by which that express company carries all parcels coming to this country from England to any point in the United States at the same charge, without regard to the distance it has traveled. Now, a 11-pound parcel is 2 cents a pound.

long-standing policy should never be abandoned unless very cogent reasons can be given to show its unsoundness.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at

Mr. DAFFERTY. Ar. Charman, whi the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is it not a fact that in these foreign countries the weight limit is 11 pounds?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, no; that is not the fact at all.

Mr. LAFFERTY. What is the weight limit?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. It varies. In some countries it is 11 pounds, in some 22 pounds, in some 100 pounds, and in some 110 pounds.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If the weight should be fixed at 100 pounds in this country, at a flat rate from coast to coast, is it not probable that the manufacturers of flour and shingles on the Pacific coast would put up their products in 100-pound packages and send them through the mails?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Would it be probable?
Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes; at a flat rate.
Mr. WITHERSPOON. I think it would be impossible.

Why? Mr. LAFFERTY.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Because they would have to compete with the railroad companies as freight, and we can never make the rate on parcels such that you could compete with the railroad companies

Mr. LAFFERTY. I am in favor of a parcel post, but I want one that will be practicable.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. So do I. If I wanted one that was impracticable I would not want one at all, because I do not see how you can have any other kind except a practicable one; but they have them in other countries, where they carry more than 110 pounds, and I submit that whatever people in any other country on earth can do we can do also. [Applause.]

The second reason why I favor a flat rate is that it is the most simple and inexpensive method. If you want to make a success of the parcel post one of the most important things you can do is to have it as simple and inexpensive as possible. Those who at heart do not want it would like to have you make it so expensive that it would break itself down. Those who really want it and would like to see it succeed should contend that it be as simple and as inexpensive as possible.

With the flat rate the only trouble and expense in determining the correct amount of postage is to weigh the parcel; and whether this trouble and expense be incurred by the sender of the parcel or by the postmaster, or by both, it reduces the expense, so far as the determination of the correct amount of postage is concerned, to a minimum; but if the postage rate is to be graded according to distance, it is almost inconceivable how you are ever going to find out how much postage to put on your parcel.

The expense of ascertaining how far it is from Boston, Ga., to Kalamazoo, Mich., will be such that most people would throw their parcels away rather than go to the trouble of finding how much the postage ought to be. You have got not only to weigh your parcel, but you have got to go and get some map, or some way to calculate the distance; and then when you get the distance your parcel has to go and the weight of it, if you have studied arithmetic, you may be able to sit down and work out how much your postage is.

The graded rate would not only result frequently in great confusion as to the correct amount of postage, but the cost of assertaining it would often exceed the postage.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I believe the gentleman is speaking on the question of rates.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman answer my question, what the rate of postage ought to be per pound, on a flat rate?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I intended to answer the gentleman fully when I began to discuss the question of how high the rates ought to be. Since the gentleman has asked the question twice, though, I will pause here to say that I do not believe any human being knows or can know, and I do not believe any commission you can ever appoint will find out exactly how much the postage rate ought to be. It is utterly impossible to do it. But my suggestion would be that the most sensible thing to do would be to try it on that rate that was adopted and proved satisfactory in England, and if it turns out to be too high we can reduce it. If it turns out to be too low, we can raise it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What was that rate?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That rate as I remember it is 6 cents for a parcel weighing 1 pound, and then the rate decreases as the weight increases, up to 11 pounds, and the postage on an Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What is the average length of haul

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do not know what is the average length of haul.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is not more than one-fifth of what it would be in the United States, is it?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do not think it is. I do not think that makes much difference.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is estimated by the department that it costs about 64 cents a pound to send fourth-class matter, to which you have to add the cost of handling, of course, which would probably make it more than 8 cents on their estimate. Would you think it wise to establish a rate that was less than that figure?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. If you assume all those things, I would not.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is the best information we

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I have read that information very carefully in the hearings, but I do not think the department has the correct idea about the cost. I do not believe they know what the cost is. You can not hire a wagon and hitch a mule to it and fill it half full of stuff and then put in something else and tell me what the cost of carrying the something else is.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know, but there have been two or three commissions with expert testimony before them. There have been statements of statisticians and the department information expressing the opinion from actual experience, and they all reach about the same conclusion.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I have read all their arguments, and they do not even know how many parcels there were. They counted them years after the parcels had passed out of existence and made some kind of calculation as to cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield the gentleman half an hour more. Can the gentleman finish in that time?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will get through in a half an hour

if I am not asked any more questions.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, we will yield the gentleman time enough to answer the questions. Now, if it is true that all of the statisticians, scientific experts, and the department that has had a good deal of experience have reached a con-clusion that you say is not correct, would it be wise for us here with the limited information that this body has to throw away all of that testimony and attempt arbitrarily to fix the rate regardless of their view?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; and I will tell you why. It is a self-evident proposition that any people that can produce any kind of wealth can profitably transport that wealth to market.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We are talking about rates.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We are talking about rates. Mr. WITHERSPOON. Let me answer the gentleman's question. You can not tell me that a man can take enough capital to buy land and mules and plows and labor and everything of that kind, and produce agricultural wealth, and, then, that he must let it be wasted because the department here in Washington says that it can not be profitably transported. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Nobody assumes that; the question is as to the sources of information. If from all sources of information Congress has had heretofore it has not been able to obtain a figure that is correct as to the cost of transportation, what view would the gentleman take of that? Would be go along blindly and fix another rate or fix the rate agreed upon experimentally?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Agreed upon by whom?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The rate that has been determined by the department.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No, sir; I would not agree to any rate the depatrment determined upon, because before I would do that I would oppose a parcel post. You can not have a parcel post with any 12-cents-a-pound rate. That is impossible.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If, as a matter of fact, assuming it to be true-I understand the gentleman does not agree to the fact, but there are those who think it is correct—that it costs the Government now to transport and handle fourth-class matter something over 8 cents, ought we to make a flat rate less than 8 cents a pound?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No; I do not think you ought to fix it at less than the cost.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think we are paying too much for the transportation now when the express companies pay three-quarters of a cent a pound and they have some division between them and the railroad company which we have not been able to ascertain? Would it not be better for the Government, before it undertakes the transportation in competition with the express companies, to enforce its authority and power and make the railroad company give to the Government of the United States as low a rate of transporta-tion as that it gives to the express company?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No; I think it ought to be done at the same time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It ought to be done to make the act

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Make the railroad companies carry merchandise for the Government at the same rate for another

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. A moment ago the gentleman spoke about the rates of England on small packages; does the gentleman remember what the rate is on 100 pounds?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Eleven pounds is the maximum weight limit in England.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I understand in some countries runs up as high as 132 pounds.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What is the rate on that?
Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will excuse me, I will give him those rates as I remember them when I come to discuss what the rate should be.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes up the thread of his argument will he yield for a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly. Mr. WEEKS. Does the gentleman recall whether the English parcel post pays a profit or not?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do not recall it, and I do not think anybody else recalls it, because all of the evidence that I have read upon the subject shows that they have all their mail mixed up together just as we have ours, and that it is utterly impossible to tell whether any particular kind of mail is profitable or unprofitable. I call the gentleman's attention to a volume of 320 pages, consisting of the replies of American consuls to the Secretary of State, from all the countries of the world, and all of those consuls were asked that question and not one of them could find out in any country on earth what the cost of the parcel post part of the mail was. The only country on earth that can do it is a country that does not want any parcel post at all, and that is our country.

Mr. WEEKS. One suggestion more. We pay about $160,000,000 a year for handling our mail. That pays the postmasters, the clerks, the carriers, the railway post-office clerks, and so forth.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the cost of labor for handling the mail.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. In England that labor would not cost over $100,000,000, and probably less rather than more. In other words, there is a difference of $60,000,000. From what source is that $60,000,000 going to be dug up if we make the same rate that they have in England?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The gentleman and I are now getting into a domain where we can not agree.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to answer that question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. The increased revenue to cover the increased expense, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, is derived from the fact that the American postal employee performs nearly twice as much work as the English postal

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That is just what I had in mind by saying that we could not agree about it.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be an answer, if the premise were correct, but I do not think the premise is correct, and I do not think the gentleman from Maryland has any information that would substantiate that.

Mr. LEWIS. I have very accurate information, official in-

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I know very little about this subject, except what I read in the hearings, where the gentleman from Massachusetts was present and did a great deal of the questioning of the witnesses. I found printed in those hearings a statement to the effect that the postal clerks or servants in the United States handled per capita about twice as much mail as the English do. I got that information from the gentleman's own hearings, and I suppose it must be correct. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman after he gets on to his line of argument, and before he proceeds to that I desire to ask him if he can answer the question which I asked awhile ago. I simply want to get the benefit of his judgment upon it. I understand the gentleman fixed 100 pounds as the maximum limit for the parcel post. What rate would he fix on a broad flat rate per pound for the whole United States?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to discuss that separately in a few moments, and I will then tell the gentleman what I think is the proper rate.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I would like the gentleman to discuss also the inadvisability or the advisability of making 1-cent-a-pound rate for fourth-class matter, even up to 100 pounds, that being the rate at which the Government now transports newspapers in bulk.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman my views about that presently. I am now discussing a flat rate, trying to give the reasons why the principle of the flat rate is right. The first reason I have given was that it accords with our own experience and the experience of all other countries, and the second is that it is the most inexpensive and the simplest. The argument against the flat rate, as I understand it, is this: That the cost of transporting an article is proportionate to the distance it is carried, and, therefore, in justice, the owner of the article should pay in proportion to the distance it is carried. That is the argument. I submit that the fallacy of that argument lies in the assumption that there is any relation or connection between the carriage of an article and its cost. The cost of carriage is an entirely different thing from the carriage itself. The cost consists in procuring a car and an engine, a wagon, coal, oil, and the necessary labor and skill to propel the wagon or car from point to point. That is the cost of the carriage, and that is just identically the same whether the mail car in the one case or the wagon in the other is empty, half filled, or full of parcels. The cost incident to the weight of the parcels is negligible, and is not made appreciable by the distance it is carried. The carriage of the parcel is neither the cause nor the measure of the

The distance the parcel is carried is the measure of the benefit to its owner, and that cost should never be so high as to consume all the profit that is in the article transported on the false assumption that the carriage of the article is either the cause or the measure of the cost.

Mr. BLACKMON. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Assuredly. Mr. BLACKMON. The gentleman says he does not think the distance increases the cost of carrying the article.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No; I do not think it has anything to do with it.

Mr. BLACKMON. The gentleman thinks that a railroad company could carry a package from Washington to, say, Charlotte, N. C., as cheaply as to Birmingham, Ala.?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; and it would be just as cheap if they did not carry it at all. If you get on the Southern Railway here and let it take you to Charlottesville, you could not with a microscope tell any difference in the cost, whether you had a parcel in there or not.

Mr. BLACKMON. I thought the gentleman said that coal, labor, and other things entered into it?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The gentleman did not understand me. I say when you have got your engine and your cars and your railroad tracks and your coal and your oil and your labor and your skill you have incurred all the cost then, and it does not increase it or diminish it or affect it whether you go with an empty train or whether you put a parcel in it. That is what I said.

Mr. BLACKMON. You burn more oil and more coal between the points I mentioned.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKMON. I say you burn more oil and coal between the points I mentioned.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; but the parcel did not make you burn any more than you would have burned if you did not have any parcel in there.

Mr. BLACKMON. Suppose the tracks terminated, say, in North Carolina and the train stopped there and you had three or four other packages to carry a longer distance?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The gentleman is supposing a case that can not exist. You have got your railroad tracks and your trains already running all over this country. They run from Boston to San Francisco. The cost is already incurred, and you are supposing a case that does not exist when you say that it stops at a certain place.

Mr. BLACKMON. Is not the gentleman's presumption very violent when he makes that statement that the cost of the short distance is as much as for the long distance?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, you asked me to pass an opinion upon my own views, and I gave my views honestly. That is what I think.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. HENSLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question? Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly.

Mr. HENSLEY. Would the gentleman apply that same principle to carrying passengers?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, I am not on the passenger problem now.

Mr. HENSLEY. That is true, but I want-

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Let us cross that bridge when we get

Mr. HENSLEY. I am afraid that we will not get to it in this connection, and I would like to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, whether or not the Government will force the railroad companies, in their dealings with the people on the transportation of both persons and freight to-day, to do the same thing that the Government itself is going to do, or ought to be done by this Government, is a question that it will be time enough to discuss when we come to it. I have not time enough to discuss it to-night anyway, as I have too many other things. Now, I want to submit this about the injustice of the flat rate. I was discussing the argument that the flat rate is unjust; that you ought to make a man pay according to the distance his parcel is carried,

Now, even in these few countries where the fallacy of this injustice argument is not perceived and where, in order to avoid what they call injustice, those countries adopt what is called the zone system, by which they divide the country up into zones and charge the same rate for all parcels in a certain zone, that very zone system is a confession of the utter impracticability of grading the postage on parcels according to distance, because there we have the flat rate for every zone, and it is just as unjust to have that flat rate in one zone as it is to have it in another. Now, say we have our country divided up into zones. We will say it is 4,000 miles across and that we have eight zones of 500 miles each. Well, the proposition is to have the same rate for all parcels that go within the distance of 500 miles. In other words, if we send that parcel 1 mile, according to the zone system you charge the same postage as if you send it 500 miles in the zone system, and therefore on that supposition the injustice is just 500 times as great in one case as in the other. So I say there is obsolutely nothing in this objection to the flat rate.

Now, one other argument in favor of the flat rate and-Mr. LLOYD. May I ask the gentleman in that connection how would be compete with the express company? Mr. WITHERSPOON. I would not compete with the express company at all; I would destroy the express company, Mr. LLOYD. Entirely destroy it?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes: I am coming to that later. I

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; I am coming to that later. I am going on the assumption that we will not have any express companies.

I say the other argument is an economic one, and that is this, that the flat rate would put every community in the United States on the same footing as to the sale of all of its products and as to the purchase of everything it needs. To illustrate, any community in California that had a surplus of vegetables or fruit would have every community in the United States as far as Maine in which to sell its surplus products, and it would not be excluded from any community on account of a difference in transportation. And on the other hand every community in the United States that needed to buy anything would have every other community as a market and could select the cheapest and best one, and would not be shut out of any of them on account of a difference in transportation. Thus we would, by a flat rate of postage, have the greatest amount of competition in the sale and purchase of merchandise in small parcels, and I submit that in this age of monopolies and trusts, this age where the will of the trust has been substituted for the laws of trade and the high cost of living fixed by the whim of the commercial tyrant, no consideration or argument ought to receive more weight than one which proposes the restoration of competition in trade. So that the flat rate is supported by our experience and the experience of foreign countries. It is the most simple and inexpensive plan, and it proposes the greatest amount of competition, and for those three reasons I hope that the bill, so far as it fixes a flat rate, will be sustained by the committee.

Now, in regard to the rate of postage, the bill provides it shall be 12 cents a pound, which is a reduction of 4 cents from the rate now existing, but, in my judgment, is entirely too high. The very object of a parcel post is to provide a method by which the people can have their parcels of merchandise transported, and if you fix the rate so high as to take all the profits out of it you defeat the very object of the law. There are a great many kinds of merchandise where the weight is so great in proportion to the value of it that a rate of 12 cents a pound would be simply prohibitive.

If an article is worth 12 cents a pound, then under this bill you must pay the full value of the article to have it transported. If the article is worth 24 cents a pound, then you must pay 50 per cent of the value of the article to have it transported. No article worth less than $1.32 a pound could be transported under this bill without paying as much as 10 per cent of its value.

I submit that the object of a parcel post is to do some business, and that it should be so framed and the rate should be so fixed as to move the traffic. That is to say, the rate should be such that it will not consume all the profit in the production of the article. Now, that being so, any rate which would be 100 per cent of the value of the article, or 50 per cent, or 25 per cent, or even 10 per cent, would be absolutely prohibitive, and really be a mockery to the people in pretending to give them a parcel post when there really was none. To my mind such a rate would be prohibitive as to a large proportion-perhaps half—of the merchandise that would otherwise be sent through the mails, and would confine the use of the mails largely to such parcels as the situation of the sender would induce him to send without regard to the cost. If the expense of maintaining a parcel post is to be sustained, then the rate should be such as to move the traffic; in other words, it should be such as to enable every producer of wealth, whether on the farm, in the factory, or elsewhere, to have it transported to any point when needed at such a cost as not to consume all the profits of its production. The very foundation of this parcelpost movement is the exorbitant rates of the express company. If it had not been for that, I do not expect we would have heard of a parcel post. The express companies collect from the people about 16 times as much as the freight rate, and it is against that exorbitant rate of the express companies that we statesmen are going to relieve the people, and yet we have got in this bill a rate that is 8 times as high as the rate of the express companies. That is how we are going to relieve the

Now, this rate seems to be unreasonably high in comparison with the rates in other countries. As I said before, in England the rate is 6 cents for the first pound, and then the rate decreases as the weight increases, until you get it up to 11 pounds, where the rate is 2 cents a pound. That is the increased rate. So that this bill proposes that for a parcel of 1 pound the English rate would be just half of what ours is, and for a parcel of 11 pounds the English charge would be one-sixth of ours. I submit that we ought not to establish a parcel post and have a rate six times as great as the English have.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Right there may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly.
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you think that the size of the country, in comparison with the United States, where we would have to make these changes, would make any difference in the comparison?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Not at all. I do not think that would make any difference at all. In France, I think, the rate is 22 cents for a 29-pound parcel. It is a little less, I think, than a cent a pound, and we propose by this bill to have a rate more than 12 times as great as the French have. In Germany, where they have a zone system-

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WITHERSPOON, Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know whether the Government owns the railroads there or not?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. In Germany?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. My recollection is that it does not. do not believe it does.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It does own some of them. Does the gentleman recollect what the railroad companies charge the Government where the Government does not own the railroads? Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, I can not give you the rates of all the countries, but I do not think you can find a country on earth where there is any rate which bears the remotest resemblance in magnitude to the rate in this bill; not a one.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Can the gentleman find a foreign country where the railroad companies charge the Government so much as they do here?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do not think it makes any difference what the railroads charge. I think it is the business of this Government to make the railroads do right.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is right about that, but he is doubling the question. We have not made the railroads do right yet.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. It is our business to make them do right. That is what we are here in Congress for.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You will hardly be able to do it in this bill, I reckon.

Mr. POST. While the gentleman is discussing the rates adopted by the European countries for parcel post, what effect did the parcel post have upon the European shopkeepers in the small towns? Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, my friend is getting at something that is at the end of my speech. I will take that up before I close. I was discussing the rate in Germany. If we consider the rates in England, France, and Germany we would be forced to the conclusion that the lawmakers that passed the parcelpost law in those countries intended that the people should use the parcel post to carry their parcels. But when you consider the rate proposed in this bill, the wildest imagination can not picture what sort of a parcel will ever pass through our mail with 12 cents on every pound.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is $240 a ton.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Before the gentleman leaves that question of rates, does he know what those countries charge for carrying 100 pounds or 132 pounds?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I have just given those rates.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman gave them for England

Mr. WITHERSPOON. England has a limit of 11 pounds. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Take any country that has got a rate for 100 or 120 pounds.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I think Germany has a limit of 100 pounds.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What was the rate there?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. It was what I stated a moment ago.
I gave the German rates. The only distinction in pounds was that a certain weight of less than 11 pounds, and a slight increase of less than 1 cent for each zone if the parcel weighs more than 11 pounds up to the limit, which I think is about 100 pounds.

Mr. REILLY. It is about three-quarters of a cent more at each step or zone.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Now, if Congress should pass any such parcel post as I have advocated, especially if Congress should fix the weight limit at 100 pounds, then I submit that it follows logically that there ought to be a law prohibiting express companies from carrying mail matter. The Government is an agency or instrumentality of the people, and to my mind it is utterly intolerable that the Government should engage in any business in competition with a private person, either natural or corporate; and therefore I say that the Government should condemn, under the right of eminent domain, all the property that the express companies are using in this business and take it over and take the place of the express companies and pay them a fair price for their property.

Not only is that true upon principle, but it is also true as a matter of business. I think it is foolishness on the part of the Government and the express companies to engage in this business of its parcels and are paying the express companies $150,000,000 a year to carry other parcels.

But there seems to be a great fear that the parcel post will cause a deficit in the Post Office Department. This department of the Government is regarded by some as a mercantile establishment which is liable to sustain a loss on account of the parcel post, and this is the reason for such a high rate as 12 cents a pound. To consider the question in the light of a financial loss of the department seems to me to be a confusion of thought. The Government is but an instrumentality or agent of the people and from the nature of things can neither make a profit nor sustain a loss. If it renders the people a service, as in the carriage of parcels, it matters not how the people pay for that service, whether in stamps or other taxes, there can be no loss if the value of the service is equal to the price paid. Whatever rate is adopted can be increased by Congress if it should result in making the revenues of the department less than the expenditures This test can not be made with a high rate of postage which will inhibit a large proportion of parcels from the mails and then deprive this department of its legitimate revenues. And I submit that the bill should be amended by substituting for the 12 cents a pound rate the one which has been tested and found satisfactory in the United Kingdom.

The bill further provides for the receipt as mail of all parcels within the limit along the rural routes, but it limits the carringe and delivery of such parcels to points on the same route on which it is received, and this limitation robs the provision of its chief value. In the beginning of my remarks I pointed out the fact that the chief business of the world consists in the interchange of agricultural and manufactured products, that the principal function of commerce is to effect this interchange, and that transportation is indispensable to the accomplishment of this I have also shown that in this transportation the discrimination of the railroad and express companies against the small parcels of merchandise is one of the evils which the parcel post will remedy and that in order to effect this object the should be amended so as to raise the weight limit from 11 to 100 pounds and so as to reduce the rate from 12 cents While if all this were done it to about 3 cents a pound. would remedy the first evil mentioned, yet it would have no tendency to remedy the other evil in transportation, which has no connection whatever in either the express or railroad business with the rural population. A parcel post that does not connect the factory with the farm, that does not put the con-sumer of the city in touch with the producer of the country, and that limits the carriage and delivery of parcels received on rural route to points on the same route fails to recognize the evil to be remedied and of course fails to provide the needful remedy. If we take any rural route in the United States, it is safe to say that every community along said route is so much alike every other community on the same route in its productions and in its wants that there is practically no demand in one for what the other has to sell, and that therefore the facility for the interchange of products among the communities on the same rural route provided by the bill will be of little use. Indeed, the only advantage from the rural parcel post provided in the bill would be to facilitate trade between people living along the same route and those living in some business center on the route. But so far as the main object of a parcel post is concerned, which is to make possible the interchange of the products of the farm and factory produced or sold in small parcels, the bill as written will never accomplish the object and should be amended so as to provide for the carriage and delivery of parcels to any point within the United States without any reference to whether it was posted in a city or on a rural route.

The general economic effect of a parcel post in facilitating the interchange of agricultural and manufactured products, in stimulating and increasing the products of the farms, and in the restoration of competition and in giving some relief to the high cost of living have been explained as fully as time will permit, but in conclusion I wish to point out the effect of a parcel post upon the country merchant and the traveling man and to show why a parcel post will injure and destroy neither of them.

Without a parcel post there is but one line of passage that all manufactured goods must take from the factory to the consumer, and that is the line of freight in carload lots to the centers of trade, whence this class of merchandise finds its way in wagons to the country merchant, who disposes of them to the consumer. All merchandise, except a small fractional part shipped as parcels, takes this course, and when it reaches the country merchant it is burdened with all the charges which the jobber, the wholesale merchant, the banker, and the transportation companies have placed upon it; and all these burdens must be included by the country merchant in the price at which he sells to the consumer. He is helpless to make them less, since there is only one channel in which he can purchase, and he is shielded by no competition. The parcel post would give the country merchant a new avenue of trade and enable him to buy at least a portion of his goods direct from the fac-The very power to do this, whether largely exercised tory. or not, would protect him from the exactions of monopoly and increase his independence. It would enable him, without decreasing his profits, to sell to his patrons at cheaper prices. When his country customers thus get their goods at more reasonable prices on account of the competition engendered, and when they are enabled to send to market what is now wasted for want of transportation, the improved condition of his customers will manifest itself in the increased trade of the country merchant, for you can not improve the condition of his customers without improving his.

The idea that the parcel post will ruin the country merchant and drive him out of business means that, instead of the transportation of about 5,000,000 tons of merchandise in small parcels, as at present, there would be diverted from the channels of freight more than a billion tons of merchandise and forced through the mails, a result too absurd for anyone to believe who understands the subject.

If the parcel post should begin to divert any considerable portion of merchandise from its passage through the jobber, wholesaler, and railroad companies as freight, the economic effect would be such a decrease in the price at the factory, of the profits of the jobber and wholesaler, and of the freights of the transportation companies as to maintain the present mercantile order; and between these agents of commerce on the one hand and the catalogue houses and parcel post on the other there would be a wholesome competition beneficial to his patrons, and consequently to the country merchant. What reason suggests is demonstrated by experience. In all countries where the parcel post has been tried it has benefited the country merchant as well as his country customers. On the 24th of August, 1911, the Secretary of State addressed a circular letter to our diplomatic officers throughout the world, in which information was requested upon this point—as to whether shopkeepers in small towns claim that the parcel post militates against them and in favor of the large departmental or city stores. The answers to the question, covering a printed volume of 320 pages, show conclusively not only that the parcel post does not injure or destroy the country merchant, but that the only country on earth where the great mail-order houses exist and flourish is the United States. It looks as if the absence of a parcel post is what causes these mail-order houses to spring into existence. They seem to be a sort of economic protest against the exorbitant prices and monopolistic burdens which characterize trade in the absence of a parcel post. If the par-cel post will not injure but benefit the country merchant, it follows that the need for the services of the traveling man will not be lessened. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield? I am very much interested in what the gentleman said, and I want to ask him a question, purely for information. I assume the gentleman is in favor of a general parcel post?
Mr. WITHERSPOON. Surely.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it the gentleman's judgment, if Congress should pass a general parcel post and we should adjourn by July 1 that the Government is now in shape to take care of a parcel post carrying packages of 100 pounds?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. To the details of it and the administration of it I must confess I have given very little attention. would not like to express any opinion about that, because I have not studied it. I have discussed the questions that I have have not studied it. I have discussed the questions that I have studied. I do not think my opinion on these other matters would really be worth expressing.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What I am getting at is whether or not, if we pass a general parcel-post bill, carrying packages up to as large as 100 pounds, we should give it immediate effect or effect in six months or a year or a year and a half or now.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Those would be important questions for the man who drew the bill to consider.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. We will have to pass on these questions, I assume, in the next week.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. We can not pass on that in this bill. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I do not say we are going to pass this bill, but whatever we do pass respecting a parcel post I assume we will pass within the next week.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. La Follette].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of some of the special provisions of this bill, and especially so of that one fixing the hours of labor that shall constitute a day's work for letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class offices and making provisions to pay them for any overtime they serve. Such a law is only fair and just. I am not only in favor of this clause in this bill, but am equally anxious to see the enactment of laws that will compel strictly just treatment of all employees of the various departments of the postal service.

The postal employee receives the least compensation for the grade of service he performs of any class on the Government pay rolls. He must possess more than average intelligence and strength, because his work is a constant physical and mental test. To ask him to work more than eight hours without extra pay and under a rule which forbids both petition and protest is a decided injustice and is only one of the few bureaucratic proceedings of the Post Office Department that need amending.

PARCEL-POST PROVISION INADEQUATE.

The provisions made in this bill for a parcel post on rural routes I consider far from adequate, but if enacted will be of great benefit to the patrons and residents along these routes.

I think the charges are higher than need be and the limit of weight much smaller than need be for the best good of both those served and those performing the service on strictly rurai routes, with the service confined only to the line on which business originates. Two years ago, when I announced myself as a candidate for Congress, I was asked to express my views on the parcel-post question, and I went on record as approving parcel post on rural routes and experimental parcel post for general service. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have given some thought and research to the question of a general parcel post. I have made a study of the service abroad, and while it varies in the several countries of Europe and has a wide range as to both character of service and rates charged, I have not been able to find a single country where the system has not been beneficial or where any injury has resulted to business in either town or country from the parcel system. Invariably the reverse is conceded, and nothing but protest 'would follow any attempt to abrogate its functions in any country where it has been established.

EXPRESS COMPANIES THIEVES ON THE HIGHWAY

We hear continually the cry from the rural districts that a parcel-post system means disaster and ruin to the country merchant; that it would largely increase the amounts of money that would be sent from the town to the cities, and consequently the small places would decay and perish and we would soon have no interurban villages and towns, but all would be city and country, hence the cry "Wolf!" "Wolf!" And pressure has been brought to bear for years on the Members of Congress from the organized mercantile interests of the country, from the boards of trade of our various towns, and from almost everybody who could be prevailed on to protest against a parcel-post measure, except the one great factor in the fight which has all to lose and nothing to gain by a parcel-post system-the great express companies of the country-who have stood, like thieves on the highway, and exacted tribute from the people of this great country without giving any adequate return. all the abuses that have been allowed to grow up and receive the fostering care of this Government they have been the most rapacious. They are a fungous growth on the "right of eminent domain" exercised by railroads and other transportation companies, parasites that have attached themselves to our railroad and boat systems and are exacting prices for carrying the less bulky products of our country-hence often the more valuablethat are not justifiable by any sense of justice or by any principle of proportion, but are exercised by greed and extortion, backed up by the complacent and dilatory failure of our various legislative bodies, both State and National, to bring them to

I say they are back of the entire opposition to a parcel post. They work on the wholesale merchant to prod the retailer. They point out how this is going to help the great city merchants, like Sears, Roebuck & Co., Montgomery, Ward & Co., John Smyth, Albers & Co., and others. If we will analyze the claims made of damages that are to accrue to the country merchant, we will find that they overlook the fact that the individuals who are getting the benefit of parcel-post rates have, of a necessity, got to buy at retail and the country merchant could, if he would, ship goods in by parcel post, furnish the same to the customer, and make the difference between the wholesale and the retail price in Chicago or elsewhere.

IMPROVED CONDITIONS FOR MERCHANT AND CUSTOMER.

It would no doubt cause him to sell for a less profit than he be offset by increased trade and mutual betterment of himself and customer. There is not a tenable argument made against a parcel post. The benefits in every country tried has demonstrated the fallacy of all such argument. One proof of the claim I make that the express companies are the instigators of all arguments against the system is the fact that the most persistent protests against a parcel post comes from implement hardware merchants, lumber dealers, and those interests that would have least to lose by a parcel-post system, on account of the heavy character of their commodities. are the ones who are flooding Congress with protests. Because the Weyerhaeusers, who control the lumber interests, are also interested in railways and express companies; likewise the International Harvester Co., which paid the largest dividends and showed the greatest earning capacity of any concern in the United States in 1910.

Their millionaire founders are connected with transportation, express, and other corporations and throw their influence to defeat a measure that, if rightfully framed and administered, would kill a goose that has probably laid more golden eggs and paid greater profits in proportion to capital invested in the business than any other in America. The great express business and these special interests—the Weyerhaeusers, International Harvester Trust, the great railroads, Morgan, Hill, Rockefellers, and all-feel that not only this particular business in which they are interested must be protected, but they have to check all such legislation or it might lead to more that would benefit the masses and injure their control.

It is an easy matter to sit back and pull the strings that put all the machinery to work, to have their various agents flood the Members of Congress with protests against the measure. They send out arguments by the yard for their agents to use, and through them the country banker, the boards of trade, the principal politicians, any and every body that can be induced to do so on the plea of injury to business, are asked to write or wire their Congressman to help kill the measure. This is all done so that the express companies of the country, with an actual capital of a few millions of dollars, can clean up an annual profit of more than 100 per cent on the capital actually invested.

SPECIAL INTERESTS BACK OF OPPOSITION.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that when I came to Congress I was in favor of a rural parcel post, and further than that, an experimental parcel post to demonstrate the advisability of a general parcel-post system to be established on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number of our people. Since I have come here, however, and have studied the question, have made note of the interests that were responsible for most of the opposition, and realize that it is the beneficiary of our present system, the express companies, and back of them the leaders of all the great special interests of the country, I am ready to vote for a parcel-post system that will give to the 95,000,000 people in this country a service equal to the best provided by any other civilized country, and am willing to go further and give them a better one than any other country enjoys-one that will make the distribution of by-products and the small commodities of farm and field, of village and hamlet, of city and town, possible, and add to the incomes of the people thereby and make possible a substantial reduction in the cost of living. I fully agree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] that all parcel-post measures so far advocated are inadequate, and I heartily indorse his ideas of a postal

There are only two things standing in the way of proper legislation at the present time-lack of knowledge and fear.

Legislators and Congressmen and candidates for legislatures and Congress are afraid to act and declare themselves in the face of the protests from the press, the merchants, the lumbermen, and organized interests of the country against it, even though they know the unorganized masses are in favor of and would be benefited thereby. In a measure, they are justified, for they can only judge by the past, and they know those who have failed to heed the demands of the former have almost invariably been consigned to the "scrap heap," and it takes courage to stand firm for the people in the face of such experiences.

HOPE TO VOTE FOR PARCEL POST OR POSTAL EXPRESS.

Mr. Chairman, I hope before this Congress finally adjourns we will have a chance to go on record for a parcel-post or a postal-express bill that will give to the people of this country the best service possible, and I shall heartly work and vote for the same. The character of the fight against a parcel post can well be measured by one sentiment expressed by the op-ponents as explained in the report of the committee on this bill. is compelled to charge under the present system, but that would | They quoted the opponents to a parcel-post system as saying they were against a rural parcel-post system, for the reason that it was an "entering wedge that might lead to a general parcel post." There is supreme selfishness for you. the nerve of special privilege. There is unlimited gall. Advocates or opponents of a measure that would use an expression of that kind show a smallness of soul and a dimness of vision that should be characterized as unfair, unpatriotic, and un-American, and totally against the rights of mankind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Chairman, I believe there are Mr. MOON of Tennessee. no other gentlemen who desire to speak this evening. If anyone desires time, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his message delivered to the Senate and House of Representatives on the 22d day of February, 1912, uses the following language:

In transmitting the annual report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, it gives me pleasure to call attention to the fact that the revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, amounted to $237,879,823.60 and that the expenditures' amounted to $237,660,705.48, making a surplus of $219,118.12. For the year ended June 30, 1900, the postal service was in arrears to the extent of $17,479,770.47. In the interval this very large deficit has been changed into a surplus, and that without the curtailment of postal facilities.

I desire to take issue with the President in this last statement, and will undertake to show that, in my judgment, the postal facilities in my district have not only been curtailed, but that the service has not been extended in the manner that the convenience of the people of my district required and they had a right under the law to demand. In this connection I desire to say in advance that I have no complaint to make of the postal authorities, from the First Assistant Postmaster General all the way down the line, who are charged with the active duty of executing the laws, for they have, without exception, treated me with the utmost courtesy and kindness, and I believe would have complied with the patitions of my people for better service if they could have done so consistently with instructions which, I believe, they received from persons having authority over them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that the points I will make may be made clear, I desire to call attention to the laws putting into effect the Rural Free Delivery System, which were enacted for the benefit of the people in rural communities so that they could have better and more convenient mail facilities.

On the 1st day of October, 1890, a joint resolution was passed

That the Postmaster General to be enabled to test at small towns and villages the practicability and expense of extending the free-delivery service to offices of the third and fourth class, and other offices now embraced within the free delivery, said test to be made on the petition of the patrons and in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the sum of $10,000, which sum shall be taken from the amount appropriated for the free-delivery service for the year ending June 30, 1891, and shall be applied to the payment of carriers for one hour or two hours per day as may be necessary for the convenience of the public and advantage of the postal service, said pay to be fixed by the Postmaster General at the rates per hour not exceeding the present maximum rates for pay of carriers.

Nothing was done under this law because the then Postmaster General reported that to establish such service was impracti-

On March 3, 1893, the following clause was included in the Post Office appropriation bill:

For free-delivery service, including existing experiment free-delivery offices, $11,254.900, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be applied, under the direction of the Postmaster General, to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages.

After this, as I understand it, for each year there was included in each Post Office appropriation bill a sum for experimental work in rural free delivery which gradually increased each year until 1902, when the service was classified, division headquarters established, inspectors, special agents, route inspectors, and so forth, were directed to be appointed, and the amount appropriated for this purpose was gradually increased until, as we have it under the present bill, about $43,000,000 is appropriated for the purpose of keeping in effect the Rural Free Delivery Service.

It will be observed that the joint resolution applied to small towns and villages and directed the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to appoint carriers by the hour, and so forth. In the act of 1893 he was positively directed to expend the sum of $10,000 in trying experiments in regard to rural delivery in country districts other than towns and villages. Under this by which these routes were to be established, which provided, as required by law, that they should be established upon the petition of families along the proposed route and specifying that where the routes were 24 miles in length 100 families should sign, and where shorter routes were applied for a lesser number of families were required. In the establishment of these routes the post offices along the routes were abolished, so that when application was made for the establishment of a rural route there was generally a controversy between the parties who desired the establishment of the route and the postmasters, and in cases where all united for the establishment of a route under this regulation it was pretty good evidence that the convenience of the public demanded that the rural route should be established in accordance with the law and the discretion given the Postmaster General in such cases was at an end.

When I came into the House, in 1910, I found that a number of these petitions that had been filed had been referred to an inspector, recommended by him, and approved by the department. In order that the matter may be understood, I want to refer to the letters that I have received in one case, so as to show the condition of things in reference to these rural routes in my district. I was sworn in on the 16th of March, 1910, and on that very day I received a letter from the judge of my circuit, saying that he had written at the request of a large number of people who were interested in the establishment of two of the routes mentioned, and requested me to examine into the matter and have the routes established as soon as possible. I at once communicated with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and on March 30, 1910, I received a letter from him in which he uses the following language:

Noting your inquiry as to the status of the case, you are advised that a favorable report on the route in question has been received and approved; but, owing to the existing condition of the finances of the Government and the consequent necessity for strict economy in all branches of the public service, it is deemed advisable, after careful consideration, to defer further installation of rural delivery for the present, except where necessary to maintain the efficiency of the service in operation or where the establishment of new service seems imperatively required to meet demands which can not be met by means of existing facilities.

After the appropriation bill for 1911 was passed, I again called the attention of the Postmaster General to the necessity of establishing these routes, and I went to the department several times in regard thereto, and was informed that one of the routes had been refused upon the ground that it conflicted with established star-route service, but that the other would be put in operation as soon as possible.

I afterwards went to the section of my district where these routes were proposed to be established and heard the complaints of the people who were interested, some stating that they had to travel 4 or 5 miles to get their mail. I then wrote a letter to the Post Office Department, calling attention to the want of mail facilities in these sections and the necessity of establishing the routes applied for, and received a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, dated November 15, 1911, in which he says:

With reference to your letter of recent date urging early action toward the establishment of these routes, I beg to advise that the cases have been referred to a representative of the department for investigation. The chief inspector will be advised of your desire that the investigation be expedited, and upon receipt of the reports the matter will be given further attention.

I then took the matter up with the chief inspector and requested him to examine into the matter, and I have a letter from him, dated December 14, 1911, in which he says:

Referring to the personal call of your secretary at this office to-day, I have to state that this office does not have a record of a case outstanding for investigation of the rural service at the point mentioned.

I then wrote to the inspector and called his attention to the fact that these routes had been pending for years and referred him to the letter from the Postmaster General dated November 15, 1911, in which he stated that the matter had been referred to the chief inspector, and I received a letter from him in reply, in which he says:

Referring to my letter of the 14th instant and yours of the 15th, relative to the investigation of conditions at Wakefield. Va., looking toward the installation of rural service at that point. I beg to state that further search of the records of this office indicates that there is such an investigation pending in the hands of an inspector, and he has this day been directed to give it attention as early as practicable consistent with the handling of other important cases which he may have in hand.

I have been to the department a number of times since that time in reference to the routes mentioned, as well as a number of others that I have not referred to, where the same conditions exist, and the only information that I have been able to receive was that the matters were being investigated and I would be informed later as to the result, and none of these old routes applied for, as indicated, have been established, and I have been unable to get any positive information as to whether they ever law the Postmaster General prescribed the rules and regulations | would be established or not. A number of petitions for rural routes in my district have been filed by me since I came into Congress, and they are still pending, and nothing has been done toward granting the people the service that the conditions in the sections from which the petitions were filed demand. I do not say that no routes have been established in my district, because I think that one short route was put in operation, and possibly one other, but if any others have been established my attention has not been called to it. In every instance where routes have been applied for they were promptly turned down where investigation showed that to establish the routes would in any way interfere with the star-route service, so I think I have a right to presume that the applications applied for which have not been turned down are in proper shape and that the convenient service to the people required that they be put in force, and that to investigate and approve them, and then to order a reinvestigation and inspection, is nothing but a subterfuge and an excuse for delay. This is the condition of things in my district, so far as the establishment of rural routes is concerned.

About 12 months or more ago inspectors were sent throughout my district, and a number of postmasters were notified that their positions would be made vacant at a time named because they had violated some trivial rules of the department, and these post offices, in a number of instances, had been established at points where it was impossible to get any person that would receive the appointment of postmaster in the place of those who were removed, and the consequence is that on one star route not far from my home there is no post office for a distance of more than 10 miles, and the patrons along this star route have to rely on the carrier to deliver their mail, for which they have pay individually, and when an application was made to establish an office at one place along this route I was informed by the department that an inspector had been sent there and had reported that there was no necessity for the office. other instances the post offices were discontinued and the entire service to the people in the sections abandonded and they had to go for long distances to get their mail, and when application was made for the establishment of other post offices in the section it was with the utmost difficulty that arrangements could be made to establish these post offices and get some one to carry the mail at all, as they were established temporarily and a carrier secured upon a doubtful salary, receiving an amount not exceeding the receipts of the offices along the route.

Another thing I desire to call attention to: There are three great trunk lines of railroad that pass through my district, going from Norfolk, Va., to the west, the Norfolk & Western, the Virginian, and the Southern; and on the Norfolk & Western the town of Blackstone, which is 140 miles from Norfolk, is the market town for a lot of people who live in the country, not only between the Norfolk & Western Railway and the Virginian in the direction of Dundas on the Virginian Railway, but beyond that point, the distance between Blackstone and Dundas being about 20 miles.

There is a star route that runs out from Blackstone in the direction of Dundas and ends at a place called Lochleven, which is about 14 miles from Blackstone, and there is also a route running out from Dundas on the Virginian Railway in the direction of Blackstone to a point called Gig, about 2½ miles, leaving a gap in the route between Gig and Lochleven of about 3½ The people in this section have made application to the Post Office Department to have the route from Dundas to Gig extended to Lochleven, or the one from Blackstone to Lochleven extended to Gig, so that the people around Dundas and between Gig and Lochieven could have direct communication with their market town, Blackstone, and this was refused, and the result is that the people at Blackstone who desire to communicate with their patrons at Dundas and that section have to write letters that travel from Blackstone to Norfolk, Va., 140 miles over the Norfolk & Western Railway, and then from Norfolk over the Norfolk & Western Railway, and then from Norfolk up to Dundas on the Virginian Railway, which is likewise about the same distance, taking about two days, instead of having this short route established there, so that they could communicate with their market town every day. Another instance I cite is that not long since an inspector was sent to Petersburg, a city in my district of 25,000 inhabitants, to examine into the letter-carrier service in that city, and he recommended that one of the mounted carriers be dispensed with, which was done, and, as a consequence, one section of the city which had received two deliveries of mail a day for 20 years now receives only one.

There is another thing that I desire to call attention to, and that is the appointment of postmasters in my district. If the question was asked of any Member of Congress outside of our section as to how these postmasters are appointed, I am satisfied that he would reply that the appointments were made upon the application of a majority of the patrons of the various offices—that is, not only a majority of the patrons themselves, but of those who receive and send out the largest quantity of mail received and sent out from the offices—when such is not the fact at all, for the patrons of the office are allowed no voice, as a general thing, in the selection of postmasters at all, for they are appointed upon the recommendation of some person who dispenses the Federal patronage of my district upon the recommendation of a referee, appointed by somebody, no one knows who. I cite one instance in which 800 citizens of a county recommended the appointment of a postmaster at a certain town, and every citizen of the town, Republicans and Democrats, white folks and negroes, with the exception of one or two, made application for the appointment of a certain party as postmaster; but the Postmaster General sent to the President for appointment the name of a party who was recommended by a very few of the citizens but had the indorsement of the dispenser of patronage and the referee, and the nomination was sent to the Senate by the President, and when he was appealed to by the citizens of the town to withdraw the nomination so made, he replied, through his secretary, that after a conference with the Postmaster General he felt that he could not withdraw the nomination that had been sent to the Senate. But for reasons appearing to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom the matter was referred, the nomination was not confirmed, and nothing further has been done about it since January, 1911.

Mr. SISSON. Is the gentleman who was not confirmed by the Senate still holding the office?

Mr. TURNBULL. No; he never got the office because the office is still being held by the one who performed the duties of An effort is always made where possible to appoint Republicans to these offices, and I want to say that a Republican in my district is a flower that is rare and only blooms out once in four years and that is when a presidential election is coming on, and one of the peculiar characteristics of this flower is that between times it sometimes changes its bue and is apt to vote in a Democratic primary. As every presidential election comes on you will hear a great deal of talk about instructions being sent out calling attention to the immense penalties that will be inflicted by the Postmaster General unless the political activity of postmasters stops, when it looks to me as if the Postmaster General merely talks in reference to these instructions and predicts these dire punishments, and the referee above referred to comes along and lets it be known that unless they stand by the party in power they will lose their heads.

I have felt it a duty that I owe to myself and to my constituents to call attention to the facts I have mentioned as to the lack of postal facilities in my section, because my people seem to think that I ought to have some influence in having postal facilities granted them. Unfortunately for my section of ginia we have a great deal of uncultivated land, and an effort is being made to induce immigrants from the West and other sections of the United States to come into our section of the country, and one of the main reasons that prevents them from doing this is because of the lack of mail facilities. I am impressed with the fact that my people have not been fairly dealt with, and there seems no redress except to bring the matter to the attention of this House, believing that some scheme may be devised by which relief may be granted them.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TURNBULL. Certainly.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the gentle-Mr. SISSON. man from Virginia that he is not the only Member of Congress who has had the trouble of which he speaks; but since the economy orders went into effect, and the Postmaster General has claimed that he has saved some money, I desire to say that he has saved it in my district by virtually destroying the mail I have one situation system in many sections of the district. in Calhoun County, in my district, which makes the evils of which the gentleman complains seem very mild in comparison. I speak of one office especially. I have taken the matter up repeatedly with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and have failed to get relief, and I have the promise of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House that he will go down with the Representative of the fourth district of Mississippi and see if he can induce the Post Office authorities to give the people down there some mail facilities.

I want to state for myself that I have had perhaps as much trouble as the gentleman from Virginia, but my constituents have been just as insistent as his have been, and rightfully so, but I am sure that the fault does not lie at his door any more than at my own in my case. I am sure that it does not lie at my door, because Congress did all that it could do to sustain the Rural Mail Service throughout the country, and over the protest of the Postmaster General, who wanted the right to displace the rural routes with the star routes. Congress specifically voted his recommendation down by an overwhelming vote. My recollection is that he got it put on the bill in the Senate, and it came back to the House and the House stood solidly by the rural-mail system, and the gentleman from Virginia, my recollection is, voted with us on the proposition. In conference, my recollection is, the Senate receded, and $1,500,000 was appropriated for the purpose of extending this service. My recollection is that the Postmaster General endeavored to have the $350,000 covered back into the Treasury. Is that true, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. About that, Mr. SISSON. About $350,000, and he had declined deliberately to carry out the will of Congress by declining to use it as the law said he should use it, so he had about $1,850,000, and he willfully declined to use this money as the law directed and has permitted the people to suffer hardships and inconvenience has expired.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to state, in reference to what has been stated by my friend from Mississippl, that it is a comfort always to know that there are others who are having the same trouble that you are.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to which was referred the bill (S. 1) to establish a department of health, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 619) thereon.

CONGRATULATIONS TO PEOPLE OF CHINA.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 254) congratulating the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, changed from a joint to a concurrent resolution, with certain amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts reports back as a concurrent resolution the following, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, ctc., That the United States of America congratulates the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, and expresses the confident hope that, in the adoption and maintenance of a republican form of government, the rights, liberties, and happiness of the Chinese people will be secure and the progress of the country insured.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that it be reported as an original concurrent resolution and that action on the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed. It would be more easily disposed of in that manner.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that possibly it might be more satisfactory to the House from which it came that it simply be converted into a concurrent resolution and still be recognized as a House resolution rather than that we should indefinitely postpone the House resolution and substitute a Senate resolution.

Mr. LODGE. That was my impression. That is what I dere. It is to retain the House resolution, and I think it is perfectly legitimate to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. The question, then, is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in this connection I do not want to oppose the passage of the resolution at all, but I should like to call the attention of the President and of the Senate to a clause of the Constitution which, it seems to me, is being constantly violated. I refer to the part of section 7 which reads as follows:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the cencurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States.

I merely want to call attention to it, because at some future time when some matter that I regard as objectionable is brought up in this way I want to bring it to the attention of the Senate and House. I do not want to do it suddenly. It seems to have been the habit for many years to overlook that clause.

Mr. LODGE. I was aware of the existence of that clause of the Constitution, but there is no question that the practice has been that the Houses have passed concurrent resolutions where they were a mere expression of opinion that were not expected to become a law, which is the case with this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know the Senator is right about the practice, and it is because the practice was going on and it was becoming more and more the practice that I wanted to call attention to it. We have got to a point where we not only do it where there is an expression of opinion, but where frequently a necessary expense grows out of the concurrent resolution. It seems to me it would be well not to be quite so careless in the future as we have been in the past.

Mr. LODGE. I will be glad to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have never clearly seen myself how we escape from that clause of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no escape from it.

Mr. LODGE. Yet the practice is, as the Senator well knows, to pass concurrent resolutions by the two Houses alone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I know it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a matter we can not dispose of now, but it is important that a suggestion of that kind should not go by any acquiescence sub silentio. It is not simply a matter of practice; it is a matter of law; and the reasonable construction of the paragraph is in accordance with what is now denominated as a practice.

There are numbers of things which are done by concurrent resolutions of the two Houses. Manifestly they do not have the effect of law, and the President has nothing to do with them. For instance, the two Houses adopt a concurrent resolution to meet to count the electoral votes. Nobody will suppose for a moment that that is a matter with which the President has anything to do, or that his approval is necessary to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, our forefathers may have been unlucky in expressing what they intended; but if they intended to say only that a concurrent resolution should be sent to the President when the President had any interest in it, or the President had anything to do with it, or anything else, they did not say it. They simply say that any vote or resolution passed by either House to which the concurrence of the other House is necessary shall be presented to the President. They do not undertake to make the provision on account of the character of the vote or resolution at all, but any vote, any resolution to which the concurrence of the other House is requisite shall be presented to the President.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi undertook to answer me before he heard what I had to say. Possibly it was upon the same principle that the House of Representatives in the report of the Ways and Means Committee answered the report of the Finance Committee of the Senate before the report was made.

The section of the Constitution from which this is taken is one relating to the passage of laws, and must necessarily be construed in such a way as not only to relate to that subject, but not to conflict with other provisions in the Constitution and the practice of legislative procedure which necessarily grows out of it. There are numbers of things, I will not stop to elaborate them at all, simply making it as a suggestion in order that it may not, as I say, pass apparently by consent that such is the proper construction. There are other things, not to say numbers of them, where manifestly the President of the United States has no concern. For instance, the very grave and important matter of the adoption of a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is a question with which the President of the United States has nothing to do. The President of the United States can not by his veto in any manner affect the action. A great many things are to be construed, and, of course, necessarily construed, that might upon the very surface not appear to be the intention of the law-

As I said, I will not interrupt the proceedings now to speak of that, but I think an examination of the context and of the particular section shows that those provisions are intended to apply to those things which, when done, will have the effect of law and be binding upon the public.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I can not let the remarks of the Senator from Georgia pass without one observation in The Senator cites the case of an amendment to the That is totally different, because the clause of Constitution. the Constitution which provides how the Constitution shall be amended provides for that; and the two clauses are to be con-strued together, of course, the clause specifically reading that an amendment takes preference. The clause telling how to amend the Constitution provides that it shall be done by twothirds of the two Houses without the President.

Mr. BACON. It does not say without the President. It says by a resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It specifically states how an amendment is to be adopted. That clause of the Constitution with regard to that particular question overrides this general provision.

Mr. BACON. There is nothing in that clause which says the President shall not be required to approve it. It would fall within the classification of a resolution if it be one of the number known when the Constitution says every resolution. There are other things which I could mention, but which I will not now stop to mention. There is the matter of a recess. There is a provision in the Constitution that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other House. Consequently, the two Houses adopt a concurrent resolution to take a recess for a longer time than three days. Nobody would suppose for a moment that the President of the United States had any possible right to veto or that he was called upon to approve such a resolution. So the illustrations can be carried to a number of cases.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the passage of the resolution. I think it is entirely within our power to change it to a concurrent resolution. My purpose, of course, in doing that is that this is a House resolution and we pass it in the same words, and I think it is more courteous to the House to let it remain a House resolution. I am not aware of any parliamentary objection to our doing it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Without objection, the amended resolution is agreed to.

The Secretary. The committee recommend striking out the preamble as printed in the resolution of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that is agreed to.
The Secretary. The committee recommend changing the title so that it will be a concurrent resolution, and also changing the resolving clause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. In regard to what has been said about concurrent resolutions, I desire to ask that the part of the report which I have marked, made in the Fifty-fourth Congress by Senator Hill, of New York, on this matter of concurrent resolutions, may be printed in the RECORD. It conforms with what ventured to say is the practice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS.

The passage of concurrent resolutions by Congress began immediately upon the organization of the Government. They differ very little from simple resolutions, Senate concurrent resolutions being in form substantially as follows: "Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That, etc." They have not been used (except as hereinbefore stated) for the purposes of enacting legislation, but to express the sense of Congress upon a given subject, to adjourn longer than three days, to make, amend, or suspend joint rules, and to accomplish similar purposes, in which both Houses have a common interest, but with which the President has no concern. They are frequently used in ordering the printing of documents, in paying therefor, and in incurring and paying other expenses where the moneys necessary therefor have previously been appropriated and set apart by law for the uses of the two Houses.

Concurrent resolutions from their very nature require the concurrence of both Houses to make them effectual, and if the Constitution in section 7, before quoted, has reference solely to the form and not to the substance of such resolutions, they must of course be presented to the President for his approval.

For over a hundred years, however, they have never been so presented. They have uniformly been regarded by all the departments of the Government as matters peculiarly within the province of Congress alone. They have never embraced legislative provisions proper, and hence have never been deemed to require Executive approval.

This practical construction of the Constitution, thus acquiecced in for a century, must be deemed the true construction, with which no court will interfere (Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 290). If it be contended that the exception in section 7 (whereby adjournment resolutions are excluded from those which must be presented to the President, although they require the concurrence of both Houses was under the Constitution w than joint resolutions, in which legislation may properly be embraced, requiring the approval of the President. They are as follows:

"Whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, having been approved by the President or not having been returned by him with his objections, becomes a law or takes effect, it shall forthwith be received by the Secretary of State from the President. And whenever a bill, order, resolution, or vote is returned by the President with his objections, and on being reconsidered is agreed to be passed, and is approved by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and thereby becomes a law or takes effect, it shall be received by the Secretary of State from the President of the Senate or Speaker of the House of Representatives, in whichsoever House it shall last have been so approved, and he shall carefully preserve the originals."

It will be observed that this statute uses the broad phrase "order, resolution, or vote," the same as used in the Constitution, without making any distinction between joint and concurrent resolutions. Neither do the provisions of the act of February 25, 1871 (now incorporated in the Revised Statutes, 2d ed., 1878, p. 2, secs. 7 and 8), throw much light on the subject.

They simply prescribe the form of bills and joint resolutions, and are as follows:

"SEC. 7. The enacting clause of all acts of Congress hereafter enacted shall be in the following form; 'Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

sembled."

"SEC. S. The resolving clause of all joint resolutions shall be in the following form: 'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

From these provisions it may properly be inferred that Congress did not intend or contemplate that any legislation should thereafter be enacted except by bill or joint resolution. That is a fair inference, because it has provided no form of legislation by concurrent resolution; but of course these provisions, which must largely be regarded as directory, could not bind subsequent Congresses, which possess the inherent right to prescribe their own forms of legislation notwithstanding this statute.

but of course these provisions, which must largely be regarded as directory, could not bind subsequent Congresses, which possess the inherent right to prescribe their own forms of legislation notwithstanding this statute.

The rules of the respective Houses treat bills and joint resolutions alike, and do not contemplate that legislation shall be enacted in any other form or manner; but it is still true that rules may be suspended at the pleasure of either House, and legislation may also be enacted by a majority in evasion or violation of rules, and even in the absence of rules, without affecting its constitutionality or validity. This principle is plainly deducible from the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S. R., 640) and other authorities.

The act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing, recognizes the distinction for which we contend. It provides (ch. 23 of the laws of 1895, sec. 59) that—

"Orders for printing extra copies shall be by simple, concurrent, or joint resolution. Either House may print extra copies to the amount of $500 by simple resolution; if the cost exceeds that sum the printing shall be ordered by concurrent resolution, except when the resolution is self-appropriating, when it shall be by joint resolution."

It will thus be observed that a joint resolution is only to be used when an appropriation is desired additional to the amount already appropriated for printing purposes in the general appropriation bills—in other words, when the resolution is self-appropriating, thereby rendering it legislation per se. When there is no appropriation, thereby rendering it legislation per se. When there is no appropriation, thereby rendering it legislation per se. When there is no appropriation, thereby rendering it depending upon the amount involved.

The printing act before mentioned (ch. 23, laws of 1805, sec. 73) contains a departure from the practice which had prevailed since the organization of the Government. It requires the Statutes at Large to contain "all laws, joint and concurrent

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit the views of the minority of the Finance Committee, to accompany the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

With the indulgence of the Senate, I will say, in this connection, that the report is signed by all of the minority members except the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is unfortunately and unavoidably absent, but we have every reason to believe that he would sign the report if he were here. I also desire to say that I was unable, for the same reason, to see the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and do not know how he would act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be printed as part 2 of Senate Report No. 591.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for a reprint of Senate Document No. 205, the edition having been exhausted.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator what the document is? Mr. OVERMAN. It is Senate Document No. 205, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, being papers containing an article by Judge Walter Clark on the subject of telegraph and telephone.

Mr. SMOOT. How many copies does the Senator desire printed?

Mr. OVERMAN. The usual number.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no usual number in the case of a reprint.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say 500, if that comes within the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. The chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing can order it printed without the action of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senate to make the order now. Mr. SMOOT. Very well. Does the Senator modify his re-

Mr. SMOOT. Very well. Does the Senator modify his request that 500 additional copies be printed?
Mr. OVERMAN. Yes: 500 additional copies.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print 500 additional copies is entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 205, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "Papers containing an article by Judge Walter Clark, entitled 'Telegraph and Telephone,' in the American Law Review, etc.," be printed for the document room.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. Perkins was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. SANDERS be assigned to service on the following standing committees of the Senate: Agriculture and Forestry, Coast and Insular Survey, Education and Labor, Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, Expenditures in the War Department, ment of Commerce and Military Affairs.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit the amendment I send to the desk, and I should like to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

An amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Newlands to the bill (H. R. 21477) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, viz:

Amend the appropriation of $3,500,000 for improving the Mississippl River from Head of Passes to Cape Girardeau, Mo., by inserting in lieu thereof, on page 34, lines 23 and 24, the words "eight million dollars," and by adding thereto, at the end of line 20, page 35, the following: "Provided further, That the Mississippl River Commission is also authorized to use such portion of the equipment of the Panama Canal as from time to time can be spared from the Panama Canal service and as may be useful to the Mississippl River Commission in the work prosecuted under its direction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senate I should like to say a few words regarding this amendment.

I have just returned from the drainage congress held at New Orleans. There I obtained some realization of the enormous proportions of the pending flood, though as yet the crest of that flood is two weeks off from New Orleans. I ascertained while there that the method of appropriating for the Mississippi River from the Ohio River down was this: A commission, known as the Mississippi River Commission, has been organized composed mainly of Army engineers; that commission is acting in cooperation with the various States in which these swamp lands are located and with the officials of the various levee districts in works intended to promote both navigation and reclamation; Congress decided some years ago upon the policy of appropriating $$0,000,000 for levee protection and bank protection, and declared its purpose of appropriating that sum in annual installments of $4,000,000 for the period of 20 years. That understanding was complied with for some years, but within more recent years the appropriation was reduced from $4,000,000 to $3,000,000; and in the pending appropriation bill, instead of the installment of $4,000,000 we find the sum of $3,500,000.

It is apparent, Mr. President, that instead of distributing the expenditure of this large sum of money over a period of 20 expenditure of this large sum of money over a period of 20 years, as was originally contemplated, thus creating an expenditure of $4,000,000 annually, it would have been much better to have limited that period to 10 years, appropriating $8,000,000 annually. If that had been done, the disastrous effects of the existing flood might have been averted. I have endeavored to correct this in the amendment just offered, which increases the next year's installment from $3,500,000 to $8,000,000.

Mr. President, the whole problem of the Mississippi River is one of regulation of flow. The problem is to reduce the height of the floods and to increase the height of the ebb flow during the period of drought. The method so far pursued has been simply to endeavor to handle the flood waters falling in 24 States, in the lower reaches of that river, by bank revetment and by levee protection, under a system of cooperation, which seems to be working admirably between the National Government and the State governments and the levee districts, but it is now clear that a larger area must be covered by these works upper States in the channel of the river below by bank protection and by the construction of these enormous levees, but also to prevent the floods from coming down to the lower reaches of the river and vexing the four or five States which are most threatened with injury

The problem of storage, then, is one of the most important questions presented with reference to the regulation of the Mississippi River. That storage can be effected upon the Ohio River and its tributaries by storage in the Allegheny and the Monongahela Rivers, thus preventing the floods which almost every year inflict injury upon Pittsburgh and the regions surrounding to the extent of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, and by storing water also in the headwaters of the Tennessee and the Cumberland.

These waters can be made useful in the development of water power, which is made efficient in the creation of electricity, an element that is entering more into the daily lives and the comfort and the convenience of our people than almost any other element. Thus the storage can be made effective in two ways: One, by protecting the lower reaches of the Mississippi River, the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana from the floods which fall upon the States bordering upon the Ohio River; and, two, in the production of electric power, to the immense advantage of the country adjoining the Ohio River.

So also with the headwaters of the Missouri River, taking their sources in the Rocky Mountain region, where large flood control could be secured by the storage of water that will be useful not only in preventing floods from the snow waters coming down to the lower reaches of the Mississippi River, but also useful in irrigation in the arid region; for as these waters are drawn over the thirsty plains they will diminish the flow of the river during the period of flood, and their gradual seepage back to the river will increase the flow of the river during the period of drought for purposes of navigation. So it is with the Platte and the Arkansas and their tributaries.

This question has been taken up in great detail by the Irrigation Congress, whose problems relate to the mountain regions above tributary to the Mississippi, and by the Drainage Congress, whose problems relate to the reclamation of swamp lands in the Mississippi Valley below; and they, in connection with the other waterway associations of the country interested in waterway development as a matter of navigation, have substantially agreed that the best way, the full and comprehensive way, of taking hold of the question of river development for purposes of navigation, to which the Federal jurisdiction attaches, is by regarding the river with all its tributaries as a unit; regarding the Mississippi River, with its tributaries of the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland on the east, and with its tributaries of the Missouri, the Platte, and the Arkansas on the west, as a unit; requiring cooperative treatment upon the part of both the Nation and the State, the Nation being interested in developing these rivers for transportation; the States and the Nation both being interested in the development of the waste land of the country, whether it be the arid land above or the swamp land below, and also in the development of that great natural resource, the water power of the country, for the purpose of hydroelectric expansion.

Suggestion is made that through a system of cooperation of the great scientific services of the country full and comprehensive plans can be made covering all these various forms of development and also covering such an apportionment of costs and of benefits as will assign to the different sovereignties certain proportions of the cost, just as they receive certain proportions of the benefit.

Mr. President, for years I have been urging upon Congress a measure covering this question. Public opinion is made up regarding it; and that public opinion has been expressed in the resolutions passed by the numerous waterway associations. reclamation associations, and drainage associations of the coun-That sentiment was expressed in a message of Mr. Roosevelt appointing the Inland Waterways Commission, of which I was a member, which commission rendered a report calling for full coordination of the various scientific services and cooperation between the Nation and the State. That report was followed later on by a recent report of the National Waterways Commission, of which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton] is the chairman, in which substantially the same ground is taken and the same policy urged.

In addition to this, the two great national parties of the country acted specifically and definitely at the last election over three years ago. The Republican Party declared unequivocally for the conservation policy of Mr. Roosevelt relating to waterways. The character of that policy was well known, and it relating to flood prevention; that the thing to do is not simply to endeavor to restrain the flood waters as they come from the was unnecessary for the platform to enter into details, as it covered every form of development to which I have referred. On the other hand, the Democratic Party, without referring to the policy of that administration, regarding itself as the real guardian of the conservation of the resources of the country through policies which it had urged in its platforms for many years, declared specifically and definitely in favor of a board of experts, consisting of the chiefs of the related services of the country having anything whatever to do with water, declaring for cooperation between the Nation and the State, declaring for an ample fund for continuous work, and declaring specifically that this work should relate not only to navigation but should relate to the storage of water for the reclamation of the arid lands above the swamp lands below the intermediate development of water power and also the conservation of forests as a means of naturally storing the flood waters and preventing rapid run off.

Three years have passed by since those pledges were given to the people of the United States, and it is time that they were enacted into law. The people, in my judgment, will not be satisfied with either party if we content ourselves in the next campaign with renewing in our platforms the pledges made four years ago without any attempt at substantial compliance with

I offer this amendment to this bill, a river and harbor measure. I am tempted—and I may pursue the course—to offer later on as an amendment to that bill the full and comprehensive river-regulation bill which I have been urging for some time before this body. But if that course is not pursued, I trust that the appropriate committee of this body will take up that bill and bring it before the Senate for action before final adjournment.

The great Sacramento Valley, which the Senator from Cali-[Mr. Perkins] represents, is now moving before our committee the adoption of a great scheme for the cooperative development of that river embracing both reclamation and navigation, a scheme which has been approved by the Engineer Corps of the Army; and yet I find upon the subcommittee of which I am a member an indisposition to consider that measure, though it has been recommended by the Engineer Corps on the ground that the subject ought to be taken up in a full measure devoted exclusively to this subject. If that is so, it is all the more important that we should have immediate action upon the general subject which will embrace rivers and waterways of the Atlantic watershed, rivers and waterways of the Gulf coast and the Mississippi Valley, and rivers and waters of the Pacific coast. There is no more important question of conservation presented to the American people, and the recent floods accentuate its importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to give notice that on Monday, the 15th instant, at the conclusion of the speech by the junior Schator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], I shall address the Schate on the bill (S. 5727) to provide for the appraisement of the mineral deposits of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES V. AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (S. 3607) to give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to certain organizations or persons in the suit of the United States against American Tobacco Co. and others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this bill is before the Senate upon the adverse report of the Committee on the Judiciary. The report of the majority was accompanied with minority views signed by five members of the committee. this bill as it is true of substantially every bill that relates to the regulation of commerce among the States, that there are two general questions involved.

The first is as to the policy of the bill. Is it wise for the Government to do the things this bill proposes it shall do? Second. Has Congress the power to pass the bill and so enact it into legislation if it be found that as a matter of policy it is wise to do so?

I intend for a few minutes to address myself to these questions in the order in which I have stated them, and first with regard to the wisdom of the action which is here proposed.

In order to make my conclusions clear, Senators, I must be allowed to recount very briefly the history of the case to which the bill applies. First, I may be permitted to say that the court which decided the case, the Circuit Court of the the antitrust law passed by Congress in 1890 has for its chief United States in New York, admits it—that these conditions purpose-and I think it is fairly accurate to say that it has for its only purpose—the maintenance of fair, substantial competition and rivalry in trade and commerce. The American Tobacco Co., when the suit to which this bill refers was instituted, had monopolized the tobacco business in the United States. It had monopolized it from its production in the fields through all its transformations until the finished product reached the ultimate consumer. The suit was brought by the United States alleging a violation of both sections 1 and 2 of the act of 1890, commonly known as the antitrust law. It was alleged that this company, together with its individual managers and its subordinate corporations, had combined, conspired, and entered into contracts in restraint of trade. It was also alleged that the company had monopolized the business in which it was engaged.

The defendants were the American Tobacco Co., the principal corporation and, as I now recall it, 67 other corporations all of which, or all of which save one or two anyhow, were entirely controlled by the stockholders of the American Tobacco Co. through the corporate instrumentality of that company. There were 29 individual defendants, and they were the principal stockholders of the American Tobacco Co.

The case finally reached a decision in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. A decree was entered awarding the United States a portion of the relief that was asked. The decree was not satisfactory to the Department of Justice, as then administered, and thereupon an appeal was taken by the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Last summer the highest tribunal of the land delivered its decision, and I but refresh the memory of every Senator here when I say that the denunciation of the American Tobacco Co. and all those engaged in its operation found in that opinion was more severe than will be found in any other opinion of that court or of any other court respecting an offense against and in violation of the antitrust law.

The Supreme Court found that not only was the American Tobacco Co. itself a criminal, but that all the subsidiary companies were criminals as well, and it not only thus characterized the corporate character of the enterprise, but it applied the same strictures to the work of the individual defendants, because it was through them that the vicious outcome of the combination was accomplished.

I intend to read, if you will allow me, a paragraph or so of this opinion, because it will show, not all the strictures I have mentioned, but the ultimate disposition of the case by the Supreme Court and why it was returned to the Circuit Court of the United States, and the direction given to the circuit court for its guidance in the further proceedings of the case.

Supreme Court said:

Under the circumstances, taking into mind the complexity of the situation in all its aspects, and giving weight to the many-sided considerations which must control our judgment, we think, so far as the permanent relief to be awarded is concerned, we should decree as folpermanent relief to be awarded is concerned, we should decree as follows:

First. That the combination in and of itself, as well aseach and all of the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately, be decreed to be in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization within the first and second sections of the antitrust act.

Second. That the court below, in order to give effective force to our decree in this regard, be directed to hear the parties, by evidence or otherwise, as it may be deemed proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating, out of the elements now composing it, a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with, and not repugnant to, the law.

Third. That for the accomplishment of these purposes, taking into view the difficulty of the situation, a period of six months is allowed from the receipt of our mandate, with leave, however, in the event, in the judgment of the court below, the necessities of the situation require to extend such period to a further time not to exceed 60 days.

Fourth. That In the event, before the expiration of the period thus fixed, the condition of disintegration in harmony with the law is not brought about, either as a consequence of the action of the court in determining an issue of the subject or in accepting a plan agreed upon, it shall be the duty of the court, either by way of an injunction restraining the movement of the products of the combination in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce or by the appointment of a receiver, to give effect to the requirements of the statute.

Such were the directions given by the Supreme Court to the

Such were the directions given by the Supreme Court to the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York and thereupon the case was returned to the latter tribunal for proceedings in harmony with this direction.

As I remarked a moment ago, the purpose of the antitrust law is to maintain free competitive conditions in the trade and commerce of the United States, and what the Supreme Court meant by its direction to the circuit court requiring that the re-creation or reorganization should be in harmony with the law, which were to be produced by any plan approved by the court, should create and should maintain substantial, fair competition in the business in which the company was engaged.

I now call your attention to what was actually done. It seems that instead of proceeding in a judicial way in the circuit court of New York the parties—I include the United States as well as the defendant—reached the conclusion that it would be wise to have conferences with the court, and for a period of several months the Attorney General of the United States and the tobacco people were in conference with the judges or some of them.

I regret exceedingly that judges have ventured into that field. I do not believe the judges of the circuit court or any other court should have conferences in the sense in which they were held in this case. The judicial proceedings of the courts should be public. They should be held with due regard to decorum and to the dignity which pertains to judicial proceedings. can not imagine anything better calculated to arouse the very criticism which is now so general throughout this country upon the action of the courts than to adopt the procedure which has received sanction in the case before us. I can imagine nothing that will tend more inevitably to destroy the confidence and the respect which we ought to have in the courts than to permit a judge and parties and lawyers to gather together in a conference as distinguished from the presentation upon the one side or the other of a right asserted under the laws of the country.

But nevertheless that is what was done in this case; and to show that I am not magnifying or exaggerating the matter, I turn to an extract contained in the opinion of Judge Lacombe, one of the judges of the circuit court, delivered in approving the decree which I have mentioned. Judge Lacombe says:

While the plan is correctly described as the proposed plan of the American Tobacco Co. since that corporation and the other defendants offer to carry it out, it should be remembered that in its present form the plan is the fruit of much discussion. For upward of two months successive conferences, in the presence of two or more members of the court, were had between the Attorney General and the counsel and representatives of the Tobacco Co.

The truth is that in these conferences not only counsel were present, but the experts in the tobacco business were also

I do not want it to be understood that I think these judges were in any wise improperly or corruptly influenced. I only say that the method in which they obtained the information, and upon which they reached the conclusion which they afterwards announced, is not the method which is known to and approved by the English-speaking people for the conduct of judicial proceedings, and I earnestly hope that in some way we will be able to so adjust our procedure in such cases that hereafter there will be no such conferences as were here had.

Let us see what was done finally. The American Tobacco Co. had a capitalization of $223,000,000. That was the nominal This capitalization consisted of bonds, precapitalization. ferred stock, and common stock. I will have occasion presently to mention that phase of the subject again. But the $40,000,000 of common stock which was outstanding, issued by the American Tobacco Co., controlled all the business and controlled every corporation that had been drawn into the American Tobacco Co.

What was the plan which was finally agreed upon, because while the decree does not appear to be upon its face a consent decree, in fact it is a consent decree so far as the Attorney General is concerned and so far as the defendants in the case are concerned? The decree proposed to create 11, as I remember it, new corporations, taking three of the old ones as integral parts of the new arrangement, and we thus have the business of the American Tobacco Co., which you will remember was controlled by common-stock holders of the American Tobacco Co., divided into 14 corporations. That sounds like a substantial distribution and disintegration, but it was simply repeating the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope.

Let us pass a step further. Of the $223,000,000 of capitaliza-tion which represented the whole of the old business of the American Tobacco Co., three companies took $213,000,000 of it. I will read the precise figures in order that I may not seem to be merely conjecturing about it. The original capitalization of the American Tobacco Co.—by originally I mean at the time the suit was brought-was as follows:

It had bonds outstanding of the par value of $104,236,750; it had preferred stock outstanding of the value of $78,689,100; it had common stock, and that was the controlling part of the organization, of the par value of $40,242,400, making a total of $223,168,250.

Let no Senator confound that with the market value of these securities. It is quite true the bonds were worth but little more than par; it is quite true that the preferred stock was worth but little more than par; but the $40,000,000 originally of the given corporation and his corporation was found to be in violacommon stock of the American Tobacco Co., mainly water, had been worth before the prosecution was begun more than 500 per cent, rising at one time as high as 515 per cent.

Bear that in mind when you come to consider the value and the force and power of a monopoly, because it was only the monopolistic power exercised by the stockholders of the American Tobacco Co. that gave this worthless watered stock the enormous value that I have just suggested. It was only because they had the power to exact and extort whatsoever they pleased to extort from the American people for the products which they manufactured that their stock was worth upon the market from 400 to 500 per cent. I pass now to the reorganization; and I want you, for the purpose of simplicity, to dismiss from your minds 11 of these companies for a moment. They stand in the same relation precisely as the three of which I shall speak, but these 11 companies as a whole took only about $10,000,000 of the capitalization of the American Tobacco Co., while the three companies which I have named took $213,000,000 of that capitalization, and this is the way in which it was distributed. To the American Tobacco Co., the old company, there was reserved a capitalization of $98,432,473.83. Remember that I am not stating a fact that does not appear in the plan itself, approved by the court, or in the opinion of the Supreme Court delivered at the time the judgment or decree below was reversed. Every fact that I shall bring to your attention is therefore authenticated and certified either by the court whose decree I am now criticising or by the Supreme Court itself.

There was a new company to be organized to be called the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., and that company was given a capitalization of $67,447,499, taken from the old American Tobacco Co. A third company, all engaged in the same business, although using different brands, called the P. Lorillard Co., was to be organized and given a capitalization of $47,552,501, making an aggregate of $213,432,473.83. Substantially, therefore, the whole business of the American Tobacco Co., as it was when challenged by the United States, passed over to these three companies. The 11 companies are even worse, but I dismiss them for a moment. Substantially the whole business passed over to these three companies.

If these three companies so created and so established in the field in commerce became competitors of each other, so that the natural rivalry between corporations engaged in the same business would protect the people of the United States, then the opinion of the Supreme Court has been realized; then the conditions which the Supreme Court required have been created.

I ask you, as reasonable and sensible men, to inquire with me whether these three companies did become competitors or rivals This is the way they were created: The Ameriof each other. This is the way they were created: The American Tobacco Co.'s stockholders surrendered a part of their stock in the American Tobacco Co., and took an equal amount of stock in each of the two other companies. That was the plan of reorganization. That was the way in which the circuit court and those who were helping the circuit court thought competition could be created in that business; whereas before the decree a certain number of men held all the stock of the American Tobacco Co. and in that way controlled the business, after this performance, the same men who had held the control of the American Tobacco Co. held the control of the Liggett & Myers Co. and held control of the P. Lorillard Co., and they held their interests in the very same proportions in which they held their stock in the American Tobacco Co.

I will give you an illustration of it to make it as plain and simple as I think it can be made. Suppose that there was a corporation charged with the violation of the law in suppressing competition and establishing monopoly. Its stock, we will assume, was held by three persons, each holding 33 per cent. The Supreme Court says the corporation must be dissolved and disintegrated, and out of the elements composing it there must be recreated a condition which will be, in harmony with the law: that is, that will at least establish conditions out of which competition may arise and which according to the natural course of business would arise. How do they do it? organize two other corporations and these three men who own the stock of the parent corporation in equal amounts become stockholders in the same proportions of these two other corporations and thus the three men control the parent company, just as they did before, and the two new companies just as they did the original company before the dissolution.

So we have three companies owned by the same men and we are asked by high authority to believe that a reorganization of that kind will create conditions out of which competition may be reasonably expected. It is precisely as though, if I may suggest another illustration, one man owned all of the stock of a tion of the law because it had monopolized the business in which it was engaged, and thereupon, in order to escape the violation of the law, he organizes two other companies to do a part of the business which the original company formerly did. Then we have three companies owned by the same man, engaged in the same business, owned and controlled by one man; and yet I suppose that even in that extreme case it would be alleged that there had been created substantially competitive conditions.

Senators, it is very hard to be patient when considering a proposition of that character. It contravenes our common sense just as it shocks our instinctive conceptions of honesty and fair dealing. There is no more competition in the tobacco business now than there was before. There is even less competition now than before. It would be better for the business of the country, for the people of the country, if the American Tobacco Co. had never been challenged as a violator of the law than to have its present organization adjudged to be in harmony with the law.

Every independent tobacco dealer, whether producer or manufacturer or seller, with whom I have been able to come into contact or with whom I have been able to get into communication, declares that the grip of the monopoly held by the American Tobacco Co. has been strengthened instead of weakened by the decree which was entered in November last by the Circuit Court of New York. You will find no dissent from the men who feel the weight of monopoly and whose trade is being restricted and destroyed by the ruthless power of this new monopoly which now has the seal of the approval of the judiciary of the country and whose judgment is now accepted by the Department of Justice.

Mark how immensely important it is. To the Department of Justice there is necessarily committed the prosecution and enforcement of the antitrust law. If we accept the decision of the circuit court of New York as the final exposition of the law in this respect, if we are to allow that decision to remain as the guide to the Department of Justice, what follows? The Department of Justice assumes that any reorganization of any trust that is claimed to be in violation of the law carried forward in the way in which it has been carried forward in New York will create an honest and law-abiding corporation. Now, what happens? There are a great many trusts in the United States which are threatened with prosecution, and many against which prosecutions have been begun. They take the matter up in an administrative way with the Department of Justice. We are told, for instance, by the public prints, that for two or three months or more the International Harvester Co. has been in consultation and conference with the Attorney General in order to ascertain how that corporation can be reorganized to bring itself into harmony with the law. The Attorney General, of course, accepts the plan which has been judicially approved as the plan which will bring a trust into harmony with the law, and therefore he says-I am putting now a purely conjectural case, because I do not know what he has said to the International Harvester Co.—but he could well say, "If you reorganize your business in the way in which the American Tobacco Co. reorganized its business-that is, if you will create three corporations instead of one, although they are controlled and managed by the same persons who now control the parent company—then you will be immune from prosecution, and you can go on with the monopoly which you have created without any fear of disturbance or interference on the part of the Government of the United States." So, if this deci-sion is to be permitted to stand unchallenged, we will presently, through the Department of Justice, have all the trusts that have any fear of the law reorganized under the Attorney General in accordance with the plan that has here been adopted.

If what has been done in the American Tobacco Co. case is the real outcome of the antitrust law; if that is all that it will do to protect the people of this country from the evils of monopoly and the exactions of combinations and trust, the sconer we add something to its strength and power the better it will be for the people of our country.

Therefore this decree takes on a two-fold aspect. In the first place, it has failed to relieve the people from any of the burdens which they heretofore suffered at the hands of the American Tobacco Co. The proof of that lies not only in the opinion of those who are dealing in this commodity, but the further proof of it is in this, that since this decree was rendered, aye, since this bill was introduced—for apparently Wall Street has no great fear that Congress will take any action upon this matter—since this bill was introduced the market price of the stock of the American Tobacco Co. and the market price of the stock of these other two companies has risen higher than ever before since the monopoly was entered upon.

There was one day just before I presented the case to the Senate at a former time when the stock of the American Tobacco Co., notwithstanding its alleged dissolution and disintegration, was worth 530 per cent in the markets of Wall Street. The $40,000,000 of stock represented was worth, according to the judgment of Wall Street, more than $212,000,000. The stock originally represented nothing and now represents nothing but the power of this monopoly to exact whatsoever prices it sees fit to exact. If this monopolistic power were taken from it and it were put into fair and decent and honest competition with other manufacturers and dealers, its stock would instantly fall to a point that would represent only the superior sagacity or the superior capacity of the managers of this company to produce, to manufacture, and to sell tobacco. This is the case, Senators, that you have before you.

Senators, that you have before you.

I come to the next step. After this decree was rendered, against the most carnest protests on the part of everybody except the defendants and the Department of Justice, every independent interest asked the Attorney General of the United States, who alone had the authority and power to act for the United States, to appeal from the decree and submit it for review to the Supreme Court of the United States in order that that court might say whether it was in harmony with the law and whether it was a faithful fulfillment of the mandate upon which the case was returned to the circuit court.

The Attorney General refused to take the appeal, although it was, as it seems to me, required by every consideration. Even if he believed it to be fair and right, yet considering his duty to the people of this country, considering the vital importance of a proper interpretation of the law, considering the high desirability, at least, that Congress should know whether this is the outcome of the antitrust law and is its true application to the existing trusts and monopolies—notwithstanding all these high and imperative considerations, he refused to take an appeal and he allowed the 60 days, which under the law are given to a party to a suit for appeal, to expire. That period expired, I think, some time in February of the present year; I have the precise date here, but it is not material.

In that situation it seemed to me that our duty to the people of this country required that Congress should do what it could to put the decree under review by the Supreme Court of the United States, and, therefore, I introduced this bill. It went to the Judiciary Committee; it has been reported adversely, and, while I know it is not appropriate to declare upon the floor of the Senate what takes place in a committee, yet I think I ought to say for the members of the Judiciary Committee that they did not report the bill adversely because they did not want this decree to pass under the supervision of the Supreme Court. I believe that all, or most of them at least, felt that it would be an excellent thing if this decree could be appealed from and the final word said by the highest tribunal of the land. I believe that the reason for the adverse report lies in the doubt which some of the members of the Judiciary Committee entertained with respect to the power of Congress to do what is here proposed.

Before I pass to the consideration of that power let me say, in order that I may not be accused hereafter of only partially stating the facts, that these 11 other companies, to which I have given no attention because they are smaller companies, are controlled by the same people who formerly controlled the American Tobacco Co. and who still control the American Tobacco Co. I have left them out of consideration simply because they are small in comparison with the three which I have believed would illustrate the principle for which I am contending. I will, how-ever, give you an illustration of one of them. Take, for inever, give you an illustration of one of them. stance, the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. At the time this suit was brought it monopolized the manufacture of licorice paste, which is an essential ingredient in the manufacture of plug They made 95 per cent of it, according to my recollection, and it not only monopolized the licorice paste and other like compounds, but it monopolized the sources of supply. It holds now, as it held then, all the available sources of supply. Licorice root is a foreign commodity, and this company, with a comprehensiveness that characterized everything done by the American Tobacco Co., put itself in possession of substantially all of the available licorice root. It imports substantially all the licorice root that is used. This decree required the Mac-Andrews & Forbes Co. to transfer the old factory at Baltimore—there had been one there—to a new company to be organized, to be called the J. S. Young Co. It did transfer that factory, with its machinery and so forth, and thus apparently divided the business of making licorice paste in this country between two companies, whereas formerly it was carried on

The first thing I want to observe about that is that both these companies are controlled by the very same persons who formerly controlled the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. So there has been no change of control in that respect. But another thing that seems to have escaped entirely the observation of the Attorney General is that while the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. was compelled to transfer one of its factories for making licorice paste it was not compelled to transfer any part of its power to supply the licorice root. This new concern is as powerless to do business as though it had been established on the golden streets of the New Jerusalem unless the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. is willing to supply it with its raw material.

There are several other things of the same sort in this decree, but they pertain to smaller things, and therefore I have not mentioned them.

One other thing I ought to mention, because it is a consideration very much relied upon by the Attorney General. The American Tobacco Co. as originally organized gave no voting privileges to the preferred stock, and one of the provisions of this decree is to extend the voting privilege to the preferred stock. That is true also of the two new companies organized, namely, the Liggett & Myers Co. and the Lorrillard Co. That, however, is a mere shadow of relief. It does not change the control in degree. The preferred stock of this company precisely like a bond with a guaranteed payment of interest. is the common stock which really controls the corporation, and even if the preferred stockholders do vote there is nothing to indicate but that they will vote precisely within the same circle of stockholders as existed in the control prior to the bringing

With these observations, I intend to pass for a moment to the consideration of our power in this respect. I return just a moment to the history, in order to show why the bill is drawn During the progress of this-

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator proceeds—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia? Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Iowa passes to that, I wish to make an inquiry of him. I was called out of the Chamber during a portion of his address, and I do not know, and therefore I inquire, whether the Senator has commented upon the claim which is made, that by reason of the fact that this is a judicial decision these corporations are immune from further criticism or attack? Has the Senator commented upon

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not yet reached that. Mr. BACON. If the Senator has it in view, I shall not now interrupt him further.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am about to do that.

After the case was sent back by the Supreme Court to the circuit court and these conferences had begun between counsel and the court, there came into view the independent dealers, or the trade organizations which represented the independent There also came into view the attorneys general of several States, and in one State the State itself through its These organizations sought the privilege of intervening so that they might become parties to the record, and not only have the privilege of making arguments, but the privilege of any subsequent remedy that could be secured. The court below denied the intervention, and I think very properly so, because under the law as it was then these parties had no other interest in the litigation than the interest which was being presented by and presumably protected by the United States through its Attorney General.

They therefore were refused admission to the case, under the law as it then existed, but the court gave them the opportunity-and for that the court is to be commended in the highest degree-of appearing amici curiae for argument, and they did present to the court their argument after these con-ferences had been held. They were not admitted to the conferences, and the truth is that the whole plan had been consum-

After the refusal of the Attorney General to take an appeal, although importuned to do it by every person who had any direct interest in the matter, I introduced this bill for the pur-pose of giving the right to intervene in the circuit court and without further proceedings there to appeal from the decree to the Supreme Court of the United States. I used these trade organizations, and these attorneys general, and the State of Wisconsin simply because they had interested themselves in the matter and were prepared to avail themselves of the privileges

I now come to the point just suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon]. The Attorney General seems to be of the opinion that if this decree stands as it is that so long as the status remains as it is, all these corporations have been given immunity from further attack. I want to do him no injustice. We all agree that if these corporations were to proceed in an unfair and unreasonable way, through some method or practice, to restrain trade or commerce or to suppress competition, they would be open to suit brought by the United States, but the status itself has been fixed as an innocent status by this decree, and that can never be challenged, according to the view of the Attorney General, by the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator from Iowa understands the Attorney General to be of the opinion that if, in the working out of this proposition, in the actual practical affairs of life, although this organization complies technically with the provisions of the decree, its operations should result in monopoly, it can not be challenged?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do, although he did not express it in just that way.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator so understand the law?
Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand the Attorney General, here is his proposition: Here are 14 corporations organized under the authority and under the sanction of the circuit court of the United States. They have a certain relation to each other. They have certain stocks and bonds and organizations. Now, as long as those corporations and persons exercise honestly their powers and only the powers which are thus established, they are immune; that is, the United States can not challenge the three corporations. The American Tobacco Co., Liggett & Myers, and P. Lorillard are monopolizing the business simply because they do monopolize the business which they have been given the privilege of monopolizing by the circuit court of the United States. That is to say, they have been given a business which is in and of itself a monopoly—these three—and so long as they honestly, without unfair practices, carry on that business they can not be attacked by the Department of Justice under the antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think it is within the power of the court to decree the continued violation of a statute?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely what I object to. I think it has no such power. I think the circuit court exceeded its jurisdiction. I think it took to itself a power which never before has any court in the civilized world attempted to exercise, and I want the decree set aside, largely for that reason. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.
Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Iowa is more familiar with the actual terms of this decree than I or than is anyone else, I suspect. Is there in the decree anything reciting that the circuit court finds this plan or scheme to be in honest harmony with the statute?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not in those terms. I will read the part which may shed some light on the question just suggested by the Senator from Idaho. It is taken from the decree itself. The decree begins:

The decree begins:

Appeals having been taken by the plaintiff and certain defendants in this cause from the decree entered by this court on the 15th day of December, 1908, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed said decree and issued its mandate filed herein on the 30th day of June, 1911, by which the said cause was remanded to this court with directions to enter a decree in conformity with the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States and to take such further steps as might be necessary to fully carry out said directions. By the said opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States this court was directed to "hear the parties by evidence or otherwise as it may deem proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating out of the elements now composing it a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law, but without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property." And this cause having come on to be finally heard, pursuant to the order or decree of this court, made and entered herein on August 3, 1911, on the mandato of the Supreme Court of the United States as aforesaid, the American Tobacco Co, and the other defendants herein, except United Cigar Stores Co., the Imperial Tobacco Co, of Great Britain and Ireland (Ltd.), and R. P. Richardson, jr., & Co. (Inc.), filed in this court on October 16, 1911, a petition proposing and embodying a plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating out of the elements now composing it a new condition in harmony with and not repugnant to the law. Due notice was given to the parties hereto that the hearing on the said petition would be had on October 30, 1911, in room 124 of the Federal Building, in New York City, and thereafter, to wit: On the 19th day of October. 1911, the Imperial Tobacco Co. of Great Britain and Ireland (Ltd.) filed a petition.

Then it proceeds to recite the hearings, and concludes:

Now, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all the defendants—except Welford C. Reed, who died before the final hearing—heretofore became parties to and engaged in the combination assailed in the pleadings, which "in and of itself, as well as each and all of the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately," is "in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize, and a monopolization within the first and second sections of the antitrust act," and which should be dissolved and a new condition brought about in harmony with and not repugnant to the law, either as a consequence of the action of this court in determining an issue or in accepting a plan agreed upon.

And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plan as modified by the consent of the parties, or through the action of this court as aforesaid, is as follows, to wit:

Then follows the plan, which is minute, containing all the details for the organization of these new companies, for the issuance of their bonds, stocks, etc., and for the transfer of the property from one corporation to the other, and the decree finally concludes:

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that such books and papers of the defendants the American Tobacco Co. and S. Anargyros, or either of them, as relate to the suit of the Ludington Cigarette Machine Co. v. S. Anargyros and the American Tobacco Co., or the subject matter thereof or any part thereof, be preserved by the said defendants respectively until after the accounting, if any shall take place in said suit, and said suit be finally determined and ended.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that jurisdiction of this cause is retained by this court for the purpose of making such other and further orders and decrees, if any, as may become necessary for carrying out the mandate of the Supreme Court.

There is a provision approving this plan which I am not able to turn to just now. It becomes and is a part of the decree of the court. The view of the Attorney General—and I have no very great title to speak for him—is that so long as this plan prevails and so far as this plan is concerned, the United States is estopped ever hereafter to question it as being a violation of the antitrust law, but that if any of the parties should proceed to do something that does not necessarily and honestly arise out of the conduct of the business as so organized, they can be further prosecuted.

Now, returning to the point from which I digressed, this bill provides that these separate organizations, the Attorneys General and the governor, can intervene in the suit in New York and thus become parties to that suit and then appeal from the decree to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the time for the appeal is enlarged so as to permit the appeal to be perfected.

The objection to the bill is, of course, a constitutional one. I do not reflect upon the opinions of any of my brother lawyers on either the Judiciary Committee or in the Senate, but I am happy in the belief-and I hope to long continue in the beliefthat the men in the Senate exercise their judgments and hold their opinions honestly and fairly, but granting all that I have observed, not only here but elsewhere, that if we do not want to do a thing very much or very badly it is a great deal easier to find objections to doing it than though we really wanted to do it and wanted to do it very much; and I therefore do not entirely, to be candid about it, trust my own judgment about this. I want to get this decree before the Supreme Court of the United States. of the United States. I think it is vital; I think it is over-whelmingly important; and therefore these constitutional objections which lie so plentifully scattered along the pathway do not seem to me as formidable as they may seem to others who are not so enthusiastic with regard to the outcome which I desire to reach.

The objections, as I understand them and as they are put in the majority report are, first, that if these persons and organizations were allowed to intervene and attempt to take the case to the Supreme Court, it would be attempting to confer original jurisdiction upon that court. Fortunately there is not much disagreement among the lawyers who have considered this bill with regard to the principles themselves. The whole disagreement, as it seems to me, relates to the application of those principles to the case, and I want Senators to understand that I admit, first, that it is not within the power of Congress at this stage in the proceeding to introduce new parties, asserting new rights, upon which there must be a trial in the circuit court.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the bill of the Senator go any further than to simply provide a party for the purpose of perfecting an appeal? It does not contemplate any retrial or rediscussion or reopening of the case which has been closed in the court below.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not. Mr. BORAH. It simply provides a party to take, as it were, the place which belonged to the Attorney General in the matter of perfecting the appeal?

Mr. CUMMINS. It might be expressed this way: It is allowing these persons and organizations to use the name of the United States in the appeal from this decree inasmuch as the appeal will not be taken by that department, which, under the law, has the right to use the name of the United States for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Now, when the case reaches the Supreme Court of the United States that court will exercise the same jurisdiction and upon the same record review the matter precisely as if the Attorney General had taken the appeal?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, and it is so expressly declared in the bill. There can be no controversy with regard to that. The proposed intervenors are given the right to intervene in the public interest. The United States enforces the antitrust law for the public welfare, for the protection, not of private interests, but for the protection of all the people of the country, and these intervenors are in a way substituted for the United States in that interest. If the bill were to pass, the procedure would be that these intervenors would appear in the Circuit Court of the United States, and then having that status in the Circuit Court, they would given the notice of appeal precisely as the United States would have given it, and thereupon the record would go to the Supreme Court precisely as it would have gone if the United States had taken the appeal. Therein lies the whole fallacy, if I may be permitted to use that word, of those who oppose or object to it on the ground of its unconstitutionality. They assume apparently that we are endeavoring to introduce into the court in New York parties who have some other or different right to assert than that which has already been asserted in the case by the United States, and the very moment that the true relation of these intervenors to the suit is understood and appreciated, in my opinion, every objection which has been made disappears. There is not any doubt from my point of view of the right of Congress to give to these people the privilege or power of intervening in this suit for the purpose of doing the very thing in the public interest and for the public welfare that the United States could have done through the Department of Justice.

Just here I may remark there is another way in which this could be brought about, and there are some members of the committee who believe that it is the way which should be Upon the most careful reflection, investigation, and study, I have no doubt now that we could command the Attorney General to take an appeal from this decree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Iowa suspend for a moment? The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States. Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on the request of the Senator from Kansas, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

I wish to say to the Senator

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do, gladly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to say to the Senator, with his permission, that he does not absolutely classify all Senators who have some interest in this bill. I am most earnestly in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. I think the decree ought to be reviewed. I can not believe that the Supreme Court would ever sanction what the circuit court has done. At the same time I confess that I have very grave doubts as to the constitutionality of a provision which, after a final decree, constitutes certain parties as parties to the case and clothes them with power to take an appeal.

I recognize the fact that whatever we may think about it at I recognize the fact that whatever we may think about it at last the final word is to be spoken by the Supreme Court. I very much fear that that court would take the view that adopting this course is practically giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction. Therefore, I would very much prefer the alternative which is now suggested by the Senator; that is, a provision which would make it the duty of the Attorney General to take the appeal to take the appeal.

I make this statement because the Senator in his several classifications of Senators did not embrace the particular class to which I belong.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I think it is quite true that every general classification is to a degree inaccurate. It is impossible ble in a general classification to be wholly just or entirely ac-I spoke rather from my own experience. I practiced law for a good many years, and I know from my own observation as well as my own work that objections do not seem to me to be so formidable if there is an earnest desire to overcome them and reach the end. However, that is not ma-

I know that there are members of the Judiciary Committee who believe that the best way, and the only way, that the result we desire to accomplish can be obtained is through a command to the Attorney General to take an appeal. frankly that I would a great deal rather have that than nothing. I suppose I would have drawn the bill in that way, in the first place, if I had not felt that when the case reached the Supreme Court it would be far better in the hands of lawyers who really wanted the decree of the court below reversed than in the hands of a man who wanted the decree of the court below sustained.

I do not think the Attorney General could very consistently, after all that he has said, appear in the Supreme Court insisting upon a reversal of this decree, because he has declared not only to us in the Judiciary Committee, but, as you all know, to the public that he believes the decree is right and is substantially what it ought to be. I take it for granted that he is honest and sincere in that position, and in some way or other this case should be presented to the Supreme Court by counsel who feel that the decree of the court below is wrong and ought to be reversed. That led me to take the course I have taken, because I knew if we could put the appeal in the hands of these organizations and these Attorneys General it would be pre-sented with zeal and earnestness and ability and a great desire that justice should be done.

Mr. BACON. I will suggest to the Senator that possibly the end might be accomplished by making it the duty of the Attorney General to take the appeal and then making suitable provision for certain parties to be heard when that case was before the Supreme Court by argument. That would not be making them parties, but at the same time it would give them a right to be heard—a thing that is frequently done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say that we can not reach the results in that way, but I am prepared to say that I am vastly more interested in securing the review than I am as to the method or course by which we secure it. I will yield very readily at any time to any suggestion that will obtain the result and that will encounter fewer objections than the plan I have presented will encounter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah. Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa, as I understand him, thinks it would be within the power of Congress to pass a law directing the Attorney General to appeal this case. I understand the Senator from Georgia to agree to that proposition. I wanted to ask the Senator a question, and if he will bear with me a minute I wish to preface it by a statement of what I understand to be the fundamental principle involved here.

Under the Constitution the people of the United States have created three separate departments to administer their Government, the executive department, the legislative department, and the judicial department. It has intrusted to those three several departments certain definite functions, and by intrusting them to those several departments it has forbidden the particular function conferred upon one to be exercised by Thus, except in exceptional cases provided for by the Constitution itself, Congress can not exercise judicial functions; the executive may not exercise legislative functions; the judicial can exercise neither legislative nor executive

Now, it is a legislative function to pass a law laying down a rule of conduct with reference to the general class of cases which come under it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator bear with me for a moment? It is a judicial function to interpret that law and apply it to the particular case as it arises. It is an executive function to enforce the law in the given case, to direct prosecutions to be brought for a violation of the given law.

In view of that would the Senator say that Congress would have the power to pass a law, having information that somebody within the jurisdiction of the United States had committed a murder, to direct the Attorney General to institute a prosecution against that person accused of crime?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Schatch from Can't question, in order to amplify—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I wish to get an answer to my question, and then I want to follow it with another.

Mr. BORAH. I want to get the Senator's position clearly before the Senator from Iowa and the Senate before a further question is asked.

Suppose, instead of passing this particular bill for this particular case, we should amend the Sherman law, and so amend it as to provide that in all instances where the Supreme Court returns a case to the lower court for the purpose of securing a disorganization of a monopoly it should be the duty of the Attorney General to appeal in all instances from the court below to the court above. Could we not pass such a law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so; subject to this qualification: We are not forbidden from passing retroactive legislation, as is sometimes stated, but we can not pass retroactive legislation which will affect vested rights. If any rights are vested under this decree, a law although in general terms, would not be valid as applied to that case if it permitted an appeal to be taken in such a way as to disturb vested rights under the decree.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose it be admitted we can not pass a law which disturbs vested rights without giving the party an opportunity to be heard by some provision which would be termed due process of law, but would not the appeal under such circumstances itself be due process of law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it would not be due process of law if it disturbed vested rights. If, for example, I had brought an action against the Senator from Idaho to recover a piece of land and had gene into possession of it, and probably sold a part of it to somebody else, I do not think any law could be passed, assuming the power of Congress to legislate on that subject, which would disturb that disposition of the property. But, however, the distinction

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me to answer his first question;

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. My answer to it at the moment is this: The bill I am discussing does not contain any command to the Attorney General. When I drew it I had grave doubt about the power of Congress to command the Attorney General to appeal this case. Therefore, I did not take that course. Subsequent discussion, however, and further reflection, and the confidence I feel in the judgment of those Senators who have looked into the subject, have led me to believe that we can do it. But I would rather not discuss that question until we reach it, because that involves the notion that it will in some way take the place of the bill I have already before the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question that I intended to ask the Senator following his reply, and that I want now to ask is this: If we can not direct the Attorney General or the executive department of the Government to institute a prosecution for a given violation of law, can we ignore the executive department and direct somebody else to do it? In other words, is it not an executive function, not a legislative function?

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that point I have no doubt whatever. I have no doubt that Congress can direct, as it has directed in a great many instances other departments, those created by itself, to enforce the law and to bring suit. Evidently the idea of the Senator from Utah is that the enforcement of the law, so far as it is enforced in court proceedings, must be remitted to the Department of Justice. I do not agree to that, I think we could give, if we desired to do it, the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to bring all these suits for the enforcement of the antitrust law or any other law. I think the Attorney General is a creature of Congress. Congress made the Attorney General, and it can circumscribe, of course, the work which he has to do.

The last question put by the Senator from Utah really, as I look at it, has no connection with the first one he put.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may be dull, but I was under the impression that it had.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. Suppose we had directed the Interstate Commerce Commission as a body to bring these suits and the Interstate Commerce Commission had brought this suit and the decree had been precisely what it is, I formerly had doubts whether we could pass a law commanding the Interstate Commerce Commission to appeal the suit. That is commanding an officer, whether he be in the Department of Justice or whether he be in the Bureau of Corporations, or wherever he may be, to do a particular thing in a particular

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield

to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. In a moment. I am not expressing any epinion upon that point. As I said, I had that doubt, and I therefore did not follow it. But it is entirely different for Congress to say that the United States or somebody for the United States may appeal the case without putting a command on any particular officer of the Government to do the thing in

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, I grant that Congress has the power to pass a law directing that in a given class of cases the Attorney General shall institute a prosecution, and make it his duty to do it, but when Congress passes a law declaring that certain things done by the citizen shall constitute a violation of it, then the institution of the suit under that law is an executive function and not a legislative function. just as the determination of the suit afterwards brought is a judicial function and not a legislative function or an executive function. We can only deal with the subject, as I view it, by general legislation and not by specific legislation directing the executive department to see that a particular violation of the law is followed by a prosecution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not recognize any difference between a special and a general law in that regard. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has decided a time or two, in cases with which the Senator from Utah is no doubt familiar, that you can provide for an appeal long after the time has gone by when even an appeal could not have been taken under the law as it existed at the time the judgment was rendered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it does not disturb vested rights.

Mr. BORAH. I am coming to that. The Supreme Court has not laid very much stress on the question of vested rights in such instances. The Supreme Court has decided that a decree which fixes a status of a citizen, upon which status he receives and enjoys certain rights, may be appealed from after the time in which it could have been appealed from at the time the judgment was rendered. It has gone further and it has provided that you may have an appeal in cases where there was no appeal at the time the judgment was rendered, although that judgment fixed the right.

Now, if that is true, could we not provide by law that the Attorney General should appeal in all cases of this kind, and fix the time for the appeal so far ahead, say six months, that it would be within the time in which to yet take an appeal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has the Supreme Court held that in any case, in the case of John Doe v. Richard Roe, for example, which has already been decided, where rights have attached, that the Congress of the United States may pass a law authorizing one party, the losing party in that case, to appeal to the

Mr. BORAH. I think it has decided that proposition. for instance, the case which went up to the Supreme Court at the time that Nevada came into the Union as a State. peal died, the parties had lost the right of appeal, the judgment had become fixed, the status of the parties and the rights of the property under the judgment had become fixed. Notwithstanding that, a year or a year and a half thereafter, Congress passed an act which provided that one of the parties should take an appeal, and they took an appeal. All the rights of the parties under that decree were as fixed and settled within 24 hours after the time for an appeal had gone by as they were a year thereafter. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to examine the decision and see just the extent of it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in a moment. We are probably projecting ourselves a little in advance of the propositions I was discussing. I will come to the question of vested rights presently, and of course that doctrine is just as applicable to the bill I have introduced as to the suggestion that we command the Attorney General to take an appeal. I will consider that a little later. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

that a little later. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Does the Senator from Utah contend that the Attorney General derives any of his powers from the executive department of the Government?

Supreme Court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, he gets his orders from the executive department.

Mr. BACON. That is not the question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But he gets his authority by an act of

Mr. BACON. Very well; he gets no— Mr. SUTHERLAND. So does a judge get his authority froman act of Congress; and yet we can not invade the functions of a judge.

Mr. BACON. Not by any means. The Supreme Court decided that exactly. I am trying to draw a distinction for the Senator, or rather to make a suggestion to him. The Senator took the position that the division of the three coordinate branches of the Government would present a barrier to our laying this duty on the Attorney General. I think the line of distinction is this. Congress can not by legislation direct anything where the power is exercised by virtue of that which is conferred by the power is exercised by virtue of that which is conterred by the Constitution. We could not, for instance, direct the Presi-dent as to his selection of an ambassador, because that is a function devolved upon him by the Constitution. We could not direct the Supreme Court as to any matters where it gets its power from the Constitution. But the fact is that the Attorney General does not get an atom of power from the executive department. If he did Congress could not add to it nor take from it. But he gets every particle of his power from the legislative department. As stated by the Senator from Iowa, he is the creature of Congress. He exercises no power that has not the conferred upon him by Congress. He possesses no power that can not be taken from him by Congress. Therefore, it seems to me, between these two there necessarily rests the other conclusion that he has no power in which there can not be a variation prescribed by Congress or in which there can not be a direction given by Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Commerce Court that we recently created is in the same way a creature of Congress. It derives all its power from an act of Congress. I think the Senator from Georgia would not contend that Congress could direct that court how to decide a given case. We pass general laws and the court in deciding the case must be governed by those laws

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator I think he is mistaken in that regard. The judicial power is not only conferred by the Constitution upon the Supreme Court but upon such inferior courts as Congress may create; and when Congress creates those courts they have powers given to them by the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me, he confirms what I have said about it. We create the court and the Constitution fixes its power.

Mr. BACON. Exactly. Mr. SUTHERLAND. We create the office of the Attorney General and we define his powers. His powers are executive, and the Constitution certainly says by whom the executive power shall be exercised.

I do not think the Senator is right; it is true Mr. BACON. that we create the court and the Constitution fixes the power of that court; but it is not true that we create the office of Attorney General and that the Constitution fixes the powers of that That officer is not known to the Constitution. There is not a line or a letter in the Constitution which provides for the creation of the office of Attorney General or prescribes any duty or any power that he may exercise after Congress shall have created the office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia a question. Does the Senator from Georgia contend that if Cougress to-day learned that some notorious individual had been counterfeiting coin of the United States, we could pass a law commanding the Attorney General to institute a prosecution against that individual?

Mr. BACON. I am not prepared to say that that would be a proper law to pass, but as to whether or not we would have the power, that is another question. I am very much inclined to the opinion that the office of the Attorney General having been created by Congress, every power it has having been conferred by Congress, every power it has subject to can be taken away by Congress; it must necessarily include all those between the two and carry with it the power to direct him in any particular that Congress may see fit to direct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia there could be no doubt in the case put by the Senator from Utah, as it seems to me, that Congress could say that the Attorney General shall lay the evidence which he has collected before a grand jury, of course allowing the grand jury then to take whatsoever action upon that evidence it saw fit.

Mr. BACON. If I recollect correctly, we have directed the Attorney General to bring suits in many cases, specifying the

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. In a number of cases. We directed the Attorney General within the last year or so to bring a very important

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To recover property belonging to the United States. I regard that as a very different proposition. We exercise our right as proprietors of land as an individual might do, and we direct that something shall be done about it; but as to the violation of a public law, I think it is purely an executive function to direct the prosecution, and not a legislative function.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield

to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It is apparent that we can not conclude this discussion to-night, and if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] I shall move an adjournment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before doing that—
Mr. CUMMINS. Just allow me to say that it is entirely satisfactory to me. I certainly would have concluded my remarks, but we have been spending quite a while in discussing a proposition that is not really in the bill. Therefore I fear that I could not finish the argument that I have had in mind to-night, but it will not require long on Monday.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire whether that is agreeable to the Senator from Iowa? Between the hours of 12 and 1 there is not much in the way of attendance.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not considered that. I believe I would just as soon have the Senate meet at 12 as at 2. That will be satisfactory to me if it is to others.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STANDARD OIL AND AMERICAN TOBACCO COS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I gave notice the other day that immediately upon the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Iowa I would speak on Senate concurrent resolution No. 4; but the hour is getting late and, if agreeable to the Senate, I will defer my remarks until Monday after the conclusion of the routine morning business, or at some other time that may be acceptable to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. In suggesting that an adjournment at this time would be agreeable to me, I had in mind, of course, that at the conclusion of the routine morning business upon Monday the Senate would resume the consideration of Senate bill 3607, or at least I would ask the Senate to resume the consideration of it.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not mean by my statement to interfere in any way with the desire of the Senator from Iowa to conclude his remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to mean that he desired to follow the Senator from Iowa, as he originally intended to do. Mr. POMERENE. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 15, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 13, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, let the light of Thy countenance shine upon us to illumine our minds and quicken our conscience that we may see clearly the way and with firm and steadfast footsteps walk therein, keeping a conscience void of offense toward Thee and our fellow men, that we may prove ourselves worthy of Thy care and protection and the marvelous gifts with which Thou hast so abundantly bestowed upon us, and to Thee we will give all praise, our God and our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

EXPENSES COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the bill without the amendments and then read the amendments.

House resolution 465 (H. Rept. 548).

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the Committee on Banking and Currency in making the investigation authorized by House resolution 429 shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by the two subcommittees of said committee, signed by the respective chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman of the said Committee on Accounts.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 3, after "429," insert "to an amount not exceeding $25,000"; in line 5, after the word "by," strike out "the two subcommittees of"; in line 6, after the word "the," strike out the word "respective"; in line 8, after the word "chairman," strike out all the remainder of line 8 and insert the word "thereof."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir. Mr. HILL. I would like to ask whether it is possible under the terms of this resolution to have repeated the experience to which we listened yesterday, that a committee authorized to expend a certain amount—$2,500—comes in later and asks for three times that amount, and it develops that a portion, and certainly a large portion, of the additional appropriation is to be used to pay back obligations which were incurred under the $2,500 appropriation. Now, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, and I shall vote for this proposition, for I am perfectly willing to give the majority full scope, to run and be glorified, in the firm belief that their investigations will redound to the credit of the Republican administration, as they have thus far, rather than to its detriment, but I do object to a resolution which gives unlimited authority to expend the money of the taxpayers of the United States in what seems to be useless investigations unless these expenditures are limited and confined to an amount which we know in advance. I am perfectly ready to increase that amount to $50,000, but I want the terms of the resolution to prescribe that no obligation shall be incurred beyond the amount appropriated, and with that I am ready to vote for the resolution, and without it I am ready to fight it.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, by the terms of the proposed amendment we limit the expenditure to $25,000, and I fully agree with the statement that is made by the gentleman from Connecticut that no committee ought ever to exceed the limit that is permitted under the resolutions which are passed in this House, and I want to say, as far as the Committee on Accounts is concerned, we have not allowed any of these claims beyond the amount of the limitations in the several resolutions, but in the case of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], to which reference has been made, it is proper to state that he was justified in making the expense he did. He was in Minnesota and Michigan, and made while there greater expenditure than the limit, but he had asked for greater limit and had been assured that the limit would be extended if money was needed. Mr. HILL. I know; but in the case yesterday you did bring in a resolution. Mr. LLOYD. I understand the case yesterday, and I am very glad for you to emphasize what happened then, and I hope it will not occur in any other; but it was justified in that case.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir. Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us what condition the contingent fund of the House is in now?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there is at the present time in the contingent fund, that can be used for these expenses, a little less than $10,000. We have not spent as much during the present Congress as has been spent each year for a number of years, but it will be necessary before the 1st day of July to ask for a deficiency appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow is the day set aside for the memorial ceremony on the late Representative Madison, of Kansas, and the Chair designates Mr. TAGGART, of Kansas, to preside as Speaker pro tempore.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Aus-TIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, this is the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson, the 13th day of April. He was born on the 13th day of April, 1743—169 years ago. I know of no public man to whom the American people owe a greater debt of gratitude than Thomas Jefferson. [Applause.] As a southern Republican Representative I desire this House to pause and consider for a moment what a debt we owe to him and what a debt the American people will for all time owe to his genius and his patriotism in drafting the immortal Declaration of Independence. [Applause.] I love and revere his memory as much as any man in this House, and I entertain the fond hope that before the adjournment of this Congress we will all see the wisdom and the justice of not only procuring his historic home—Monticello, in Virginia—but erect in this magnificent Capital City a fitting tribute in the way of a monument to his illustrious career and his great and invaluable services to the Republic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to print in the RECORD "One wish," by a gifted and patriotic American woman, the wife of our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. LITTLETON], a publication which is a patriotic labor of love. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ONE WISH. [A copy of a letter from Mrs. Martin W. Littleton to her Long Island friends.]

" LITTLECÔTE. "Port Washington, Long Island, "New York, August 30, 1911.

"MY DEAR FRIENDS: This letter was written to you in Washington, and somebody forgot to mail it, till now I am afraid it is too late. But it is not really a letter, anyway, for there is nothing personal between you and me in it, or anything newsy; nor is it an essay, for there is not enough learning in it. The only thing I can call it is a wish, my one wish. But you must wait till the end, like shutting your eyes and waiting for the wagonload of hay to pass out of sight, before you can know what my one wish is. I hope you have made the same wish, and that they both may come true. My wish is about Thomas Jefferson.

"It seems when the Nation was very young, and first starting out, its Government was without a home. It was wornout from fighting battles, and could hardly see through the smoke. Those whom it had fought were hoping it would come to grief. Its own friends were quarreling. States were arrayed against States. Constantly the North and South were picking at each other, as some brothers do. Its friends were jealous of the affections of each other for it, and it could not stay in the house of any of them. It was without money. The Treasury was empty. The wars had cost a lot. Soldiers were without pay, and were clamoring for the price of its freedom. Weary and faint, young and all alone in the world, there was no place to rest. Almost out of breath, it hardly had strength to go on doing the great things it had to do. Like a fugitive, it wandered from place to place, through stormy times, with not a roof to cover its head. And the clouds were dark and threatening above it. Some said they were war clouds. They looked black and angry. Λ shelter must be found. Λ seat of government. Λ capital city. The North wanted the honor of being its birthplace. The South wanted it just as much. Congress must settle the dispute. It had its hands full. Speeches were made, claims were urged, inducements offered, bills passed, amendments added, decision delayed. Still there was no seat of government, no site chosen, until Jefferson and Hamilton agreed about it. Alexander Hamilton was Secretary of the Treasury, and was much troubled over the debts for our war with England. There was nothing to pay them with. He hardly knew which way to turn. There seemed no way out of trouble. The thing he most feared was that the Union might be dissolved on account of them. He could think of nothing to prevent it, except that the Southern States would consent that these debts should be assumed by the Federal Government. This he confided to Jefferson. Thomas Jefferson was Secretary of State. He could not bear to see the Union dissolved, any more than Hamilton could. So, to avert this disaster, he would do anything. He would not even object if Congress passed a 'funding act,' permitting the Federal Government to pay these debts. Hamilton, not less patriotic, said he would not object to the cause Jefferson had espoused. A cause he had espoused with his whole heart, as a bridegroom his bride. The cause was that of locating the Capital City in his beloved South. One day it was agreed to. An act of Congress was then passed to establish the seat of government in a 'district or territory not exceeding 10 miles square, to be located on the river

"What a precious gift to the South! May it never cease to be grateful to Thomas Jefferson!

"Then and there a city was born. A Capital City for all time to come. It was born in the brain of man, and it found a place in the hearts of all men. It was held in the encircling arms of a mighty river. It was nursed in the lap of a valley, sweet and soft as a mother's. It was fed by fertile fields, rich in yellow corn and wheat that in sunshine turned to solid gold. Clear, cool springs watered it. Hills of royal colors sheltered it with their forests on top, glistening like crowns. It was protected by cordons of mountains going around, their walls a thick barrier between it and harm. In the blue, blue distance they looked like brave soldiers covered with smoke from belching cannon.

"That was just a little more than a hundred years ago. "Then began a labor of love. Washington! Jefferson! L'Enfant! Laborers! Master builders! Master minds!

"They made maps; they made surveys; they studied architecture and laid out parks, avenues, and streets; and builded a city. A city of every nation, a world's shrine.

"They built it in the heart of a great, deep, dark forest; a heart warm and tender with a soft place in it big enough to hold all who wish to enter. Its goodness is above everything else in the world.

"Its woods have become peopled with tall, gray monuments of giant heroes, and children that laugh and play with their images in its clear pools, filling it full of sounds of music. is sweet and sylvan with the notes of mocking birds, and sounds of bluebirds and redbirds. Gay little squirrels scamper and run about through the leaves of the trees, lively as recollections that sometimes go running through one's head. Its dark nooks and recesses are lighted up with the white marble buildings of the Government. They look like noble Greek palaces. Myriads of their white pillars gleam through the black woods like lighted candles in a solemn cathedral. The religious sound of silvery church bells hallows it and gives to everyone a sense of com-fort. Its gray-paved streets are cut through wooded paths edged with shrubbery and leafiness. All of them lead to yonder green hill whereon rests our Capitol Building, white, pure white, with not a shadow across it. It sits as a light on a hill. "Tucked away under branches and vines are the houses sur-

"Tucked away under branches and vines are the houses surrounded by hedges. Window boxes seem to grow from them everywhere, with flowers tumbling down from them to touch the earth. Most of the houses are new and fine. Some look proud and fat. They crush between them tiny little old cottages, and keep the sun from shining in their gardens of vines and flowers. But the tiny cottages are not afraid or ashamed for they enjoy the distinction of history and quaintness of age which the newer ones must enviously wait for.

"The city covers about 6,000 acres; nearly 4,000 of this they thought best to lay out in parks and streets. They knew in building a Capital City in the South that plenty and plenty of room was needed for air and breezes; and they believed every house would be healthier to have gardens. Streets were made miles long and acres wide and beautiful with great, long vistas. Tall trees grew along their sides, and when passersby come underneath them they bend their heads over to shade them from the sun.

"Not long ago I attended the unveiling of a monument to the memory of L'Enfant, one of the master builders. It was at Arlington, once the home of Robert E. Lee, general of the Confederacy, a soldier among soldiers. The house is big and white, and empty now. Rooms and halls are quiet as death, except for the noise the silence makes. The windows are closed like eyes that can not see and sunken deep in like hollow The rooms seem to want to push out of the cold and caverns. dark into the warm sunshine. The ceilings hang high above the floor and are full of echoes that answer every The walls are covered with zigzag cracks that look like mysterious writing, and I wondered if there were anyone who could read them. These cracks must be very old and able to tell a lot. I loved the old floors made of broad, thick wooden boards. Dim, dusky shadows lay across them, and when I walked over them I thought I could hear other footsteps following falling softly and quietly. I was even sure of hearing breathing. And I could not help looking to see if some one were coming back of me. I was wondering all the time if the dead are really gone. If life is not death, and if death is not resurrection. Great spirits seem to live-seem always to live among us-even though their bodies have left us. live in their works and in the seeds they have planted and in all around us. I walked out on the portico and stood between two great white pillars. I could look across the hills with lovely valleys in between and see the ground covered with little white headstones like flakes of snow fallen from the sky. The graves were lying in beds of tender grass and covered with blankets of moss soft as down. Over them were bent forest trees. The stirring and swaying of their leaves sounded like sad voices whispering to each other. Sounds of other voices made me look around and I saw crowds of people. In the middle of them was a monument covered with bunting streaming in red, white, and blue mixed with the colors of France. heard the voice of the President of the United States, the voice of Ambassador Jusserand, and the voice of Senator Root dedi-cating this monument to the memory of L'Enfant and laying at his feet the praise and thanks of an appreciative Nation. a little farther on I could see the river at the foot of the hill winding about like a silver thread. Willow trees garlanded and wreathed its banks. Their tender branches streamed into the water without making a sound like tears that flow without a sob.

"Yet in the still farther distance from us I could see a tall marble shaft. It was of heavenly white without a blemish. It rose far away and above us in the luminous sunshine and beautiful blue sky like a gigantic, glorious ghost.

"A grateful Nation had erected it to the memory of George Washington, one of the master builders. I listened and listened to the voices to hear the name of Jefferson, the other master builder. And as I stood on that hill and looked from Arlington to Mount Vernon, from Mount Vernon to Charlottesville, and from Charlottesville to Washington, I thought of these three great men. They were all in my mind together. And as I looked there in the city of 20,000 dead and looked across at another city of 200,000 living I thought of Jefferson. And I could not see a monument or a shaft or a tombstone in his honor, In all this glorious temple of trees and marble there was no niche reserved for him. Jefferson's impress upon the city and upon the world is broader than that of any other man—and though he has gone out of our lives, not one of the things he did is gone; all remain, all live, all ours, except his sleeping body. Monticello, his beloved mountain, holds that high above all other monuments, lifting it into the clear, pure air above us.

He was born at its bottom, and while he lies dead in its summit democracy lives.

"It was he who had faith in man. It was he who fought for a new Government, founded upon the belief that all men are equal. It was he who builded an asylum for the oppressed of all nations. It was he who had the laws of primogeniture and entail abolished, and made the young son equal with the elder brother. It was he who caused the separation of church and state, and made it possible for all men to profess their religious belief, without fear of oppression, whether Protestant, Catholic, or Jew. It was he who spoke the first words in behalf of the freedom of the Negroes before any other American statesman, and if this bill, the 'Ordinance of the Northwestern Territory,' prohibiting slavery after 1800, had passed, our great Civil War would never have been fought. He drew the bill establishing our present system of colnage and currency on the decimal basis. Everyone knows that the last work his hands found to do, when he was an old, old man, was to inaugurate and build a great democratic university for Virginia, the first real university in America. He believed that in a representative democracy education and intellectual freedom were necessary.

"Without sword and with only his year necessary.

"Without sword and with only his pen he took over from Napoleon Bonaparte for the United States the great Sonthwestern Territory, known as the Louisiana Purchase, and added 11 States to the Union. He created and wrote five great State papers, from which Americans have learned their lessons of freedom.

"The sublimest one of all he wrote was the Declaration of American Independence. It brought to all people free gifts of conscience, free gifts of thought, free gifts of speech, free gifts of education, free gifts of ballot, free gifts of press, free gifts of religion, and free gifts to all men of the 'rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' The only one thing he was too poor to give free to the people, for whom he had already done so much was Monticelle containing his highly lead his done so much, was Monticello, containing his birthplace, his home, and his own dead body. That he had to leave to be sold at auction to the highest bidder.

'Sixty-one years of public service left him on the auction block. Just at this time I could not help but remember about all these things. I also remembered his dislike of hero worship. It was so extreme that he begged his followers not to celebrate the anniversary of his birth.

"But God did not intend for him to be forgotten—this man who was a disciple of goodness to all humanity. And when Jefferson's work was done and God received him unto Himself, He chose to do it on the day of July 4, 1826, the anniversary day of the declaration of American independence. So we can never forget. On the day of his death there was found written on the torn back of an old letter, in his own handwriting, the following directions for his monument and inscription:

"On a grave, a plain die or cube of 3 feet, without any moldings, surmounted by an obelisk of 6 feet height, each of a single stone; on the face of the obelisk the following inscription, and not a word more:

"Here was buried

"Thomas Jefferson
"Author of the "Declaration of American Independence "Of the statute of Virginia
"Religious freedom
"And father of the University of Virginia
"Because of these as testimonials that I have lived I wish most to

"Because of these as testimonials that I have lived I wish most to be remembered. It to be of the coarse stone of which my columns are made, that no one may be tempted hereafter to destroy it for the value of the materials. My bust, by Carracchi, with the pedestal and truncated column on which it stands, might be given to the university if they would place it in the dome room of the rotunda."

"His great-granddaughter, Sarah N. Randolph, writes this: Jefferson's efforts to save his monument from mutilation by having it made of coarse stone have been futile. His grandson, Col. Randolph, followed his directions in erecting the monument which is placed over him. He lies buried between his wife and his daughter, Mary Eppes. Across the head of these three graves lies the remains of his eldest daughter, Martha Randolph. This group lies in front of a gap in the high brick wall which surrounds the whole graveyard, the gap being filled by a high iron grating, giving a full view of the group, that there might be no excuse for forcing open the high iron gates which close the entrance to the graveyard. But all precautions have been in vain. The gates have been again and again broken open, the graves entered, and the tomb descerated. The edges of the granite obelisk over Jefferson's grave have been chipped away until it now stands a misshapen column. Of the slabs placed over the graves of Mrs. Jefferson and Mrs. Eppes not a vestige remains, while of the one over Mrs. Randolph only fragments are left."

"And I thought how much more in keeping with his sense of freedom and love of nature if, instead of erecting a statue to him in Washington, the Nation whom he loved so well were to purchase and preserve forever to his memory the house and grounds and graveyard at Monticello, now owned by Mr. Jefferson Levy, of New York.

"He is not one man's man. He belongs to the people who love him, for that he first loved them. He belongs not only to us and our people but to the people of all the world wherever And their one wish is to be free to lay upon his liberty is. grave a Nation's tears. It is my one wish, too.

QUOTATION FROM THE WRITINGS OF CORNELIS DE WITT.

The nobler emotions of Democracy are of short duration; it soon forgets its most faithful servants. Six months had not elapsed when Jefferson's furniture was sold at auction to pay his debts, when Monticello and Poplar Forest were advertised for sale at the street corners, and when the daughter of him whom America had called "the father of Democracy" had no longer a place to rest her head. MR. JEFFERSON'S LETTER TO MR. MADISON.

You will have seen in the newspapers some proceedings in the legislature which have cost me much mortification. * * * Still, sales at a fair price would leave me competently provided. Had crops and prices for several years been such as to maintain a steady competition of substantial bidders at market all would have been safe. But the long succession of years of stunted crops, of reduced prices, the general prostration of the farming business under levies for the support of manufacturers, etc., with the calamitous fluctuations of value in our paper medium, have kept agriculture in a state of abject depression, which has peopled the Western States by silently breaking up those on the Atlantic, and glutted the land market while it drew off its bidders. In such a state of things properly has lost its character of being a resource for debts. Highland in Bedford, which, in the days of our plethory, sold readily for from $50 to $100 the acre (and such sales were many then), would not now sell for more than from $10 to $20, or one-quarter or one-fifth of its former price. Reflecting on these things, the practice occurred to me of selling on fair valuation, and by way of lotiery, often resorted to before the Revolution to effect large sales, and still in constant usage in every State for individual as well as corporation purposes. If it is permitted in my case, my lands here alone, with the mills, etc., will pay everything and will leave me Monticello and a farm free. If refused, I must sell every thing here, perhaps considerably in Bedford, move thither with my family, where I have not even a log hut to put my head into (the house at Poplar Forest had passed out of his possession), and where ground for burial will depend on the depredations which, under the form of sales, shall have been committed on my property.

The question, then, with me was utrum horum. But why afflict purity the constant and

A DESCRIPTION OF MONTICELLO,

(By Duc de la Rochefoucauld-Liancourt.)

Monticello is situated 3 miles from Milton, in that chain of mountains which stretches from James River to the Rappahannock, 28 miles in front of the Blue Ridge, and in a direction parallel to those mountains. This chain, which runs uninterrupted in its small extent, assumes successively the names of the West, South, and Green Mountains.

mountains. This chain, which runs uninterrupted in its small extent, assumes successively the names of the West, South, and Green Mountains.

It is in the part known by the name of the South Mountains that Monticello is situated. The house stands on the summit of the mountain, and the taste and arts of Europe have been consulted in the formation of its plan. Mr. Jefferson had commenced its construction before the American Revolution; since that epocha his life has been constantly engaged in public affairs, and he has not been able to complete the execution of the whole extent of the project which it seems he had at first conceived. That part of the building which was finished has suffered from the suspension of the work, and Mr. Jefferson, who two years since resumed the habits and leisure of private life, is now employed in repairing the damage, occasioned by this interruption and still more by his absence; he continues his original plan, and even improves on it by giving to his buildings more elevation and extent. He intends that they shall consist only of one story, crowned with balustrades; and a dome is to be constructed in the center of the structure. The apartments will be large and convenient; the decoration, both outside and inside, simple yet regular and elegant. Monticello, according to its first plan, was infinitely superior to all other houses in America in point of taste and convenience, but at that time Mr. Jefferson had studied taste and the fine arts in books only. His travels in Europe have supplied him with models; he has appropriated them to his design; and his new plan, the execution of which is already much advanced, will be accomplished before the end of next year, and then his house will certainly deserve to be ranked with the most pleasant manslons in France and England.

Mr. Jefferson's house commands one of the most extensive prospects you can meet with. On the east side, the front of the building, the eye is not checked by any object, since the mountain on which the house is seated c on the left as far as Maryland, on the other side of the Potomac. Through some intervals formed by the irregular summits of the Blue Mountains, you discover the Peaked Ridge, a chain of mountains placed between the Blue and North Mountains, another more distant ridge. But in the back part the prospect is soon interrupted by a mountain more elevated than that on which the house is seated. The bounds of the view on this point, at so small a distance, form a pleasant resting place, as the immensity of prospect it enjoys is perhaps already too vast. A considerable number of cultivated fields, houses, and barns, enliven and variegate the extensive landscape, still more embellished by the beautiful and diversified forms of mountains in the whole chain of which not one resembles another.

(By Lieut, Hall, of the British Army.)

Having an introduction to Mr. Jefferson (Mr. Hall writes), I ascended his little mountain on a fine morning, which gave the situation its due effect. The whole of the sides and base are covered with forest, through which roads have been cut circularly, so that the winding may be shortened at pleasure; the summit is an open lawn, near to the south side of which the house is built, with its garden just descending the brow; the salon, or central hall, is ornamented with several pieces of antique sculpture, Indian arms, mammoth bones, and other curiosities collected from various parts of the Uniou. I found Mr. Jefferson tall in person, but stooping and lean with old age, thus exhibiting the fortunate mode of bodily decay which strips the frame of its most cumbersome parts, leaving it still strength of muscle and activity of limb. His deportment was exactly such as the Marquis de Chastellux describes it above 30 years ago. "At first serious, nay, even cold." but in a very short time relaxing into a most agreeable amenity, with an unabated flow of conversation on the most interesting topics discussed in the most gentlemanly and philosophical manner.

I walked with him round his grounds, to visit his pet trees and improvements of various kinds. During the walk he pointed out to my observation a conical mountain, rising singly at the edge of the southern horizon of the landscape; its distance, he said, was 40 miles, and its dimensions those of the greater Egyptian pyramid; so that it actually represents the appearance of the pyramid at the same distance. There is a small cleft visible on the summift, through which the true meridian of Monticello exactly passes; its most singular property, however, is that on different occasions it looms or alters its appearance, becoming sometimes cylindrical, sometimes square, and sometimes assuming the form of an inverted cone. Mr. Jefferson had not been able to connect t

ONE WISH AND A WILL.

(The day of Thomas Jefferson's birth, April 13, 1743.)

"Since writing down my wish, I was running over some volumes the other day, when my eyes fell upon an old record showing that I am not the only one who believed the people of the United States should own Monticello, the birthplace, home, and burial place of Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence.

"My wish, I find, is supported by the wish and will of the ancestor of the present owner.

"How curious it is that 50 years ago just this March the then owner of Monticello, whose name was Uriah P. Levy, should have died in the city of New York, and before dying should have made a wonderful will, a will to secure Monticello to the people of the United States. Part of this will I found is in the Reports of New York Court of Appeals, volume 33, page 97, and in Barbour's Reports, 40. Here is what the report says:

"Uriah P. Levy, the testator, died in the city of New York, where he was domiciled, in March, 1852, leaving surviving a widow, brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces, his heirs at law and next of kin. He died seized of real estate in the city of New York of the value of $200,000, and his personal property was inventoried at $131,000. He also was the owner of a farm at Monticello, in Virginia, containing between 2,000 and 3,000 acres (formerly the residence of President Jefferson), and another estate, called the Washington farm, of about 1,100 acres, with the farming implements, cattle, etc., on both properties.

"By his will, after other provisions, the testator devised his farm and estate at Monticello, together with the residue of his estate, real and personal, 'to the people of the United States, or such persons as Congress shall appoint to receive it, in trust, for the sole and only purpose of establishing and maintaining at said farm of Monticello, in Virginia, an agricultural school for the purpose of educating as practical farmers children of the warrant officers of the United States Navy whose fathers are dead, etc. But should the Congress of the United States refuse to accept the bequest or to take the necessary steps to carry out the testator's intention, then he devised the same 'to the people of the State of Virginia, instead of the people of the United States, provided they, by acts of their legislature, accept it and carry it out, as herein directed.' And should the people of Virginia, by the neglect of their legislature, deeline to accept the said bequest, then he gave the same to certain Hebrew congregations in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Richmond, 'provided they procure the necessary legislation to entitle them to held said estate and to establish an agricultural school at said Monticello for the children of said societies who are between the ages of 12 and 16 years and momination. Hebrew or Christian.'

"Item: I direct my executors, hereinafter named, or such of them as shall qualify, to invest the funds as fast as they accumulate, and to hold the whole of the property and estate hereby devised and bequenthed for said school and in their hands until the proper steps have been taken by Congress or the Legislature of Virginia or the said Hebrew benevolent congregations to receive the same and discharge said executors.

"Lastly, I appoint the Hon, Benjamin F. Butler, David V. S. Coddington, Ashel S. Levy, Esq., and Joseph H. Patten, Esq., counselor at law in the city of New York; Dr. Joshua Cohen, and Jacob I. Cohen, his brother, of Baltimore: George Carr, Esq., attorney at law, Charlotteville, Va.; and Dr. John B. Blacke, of Washington City, executors of this my said will and testament and trustees of said estate, and in case of the death of either of my executors or trustees or their executors or trustees act without them."

"Uriah P. Levy died March 22, 1862. His will was admitted

"Uriah P. Levy died March 22, 1862. His will was admitted to probate June 9, 1862. The executors qualified June 12, 1862. Resolution (S. No. 137) was introduced in Congress and concurred in by both Houses on March 3, 1863, the last day of the session. In the Congressional Globe of that date we read:

Resolution (S. No. 127) was introduced in Congress and concurred in by both Houses on March 3, 1863, the last day of the session. In the Congressional Globe of that date we read:

"Mr. Fresender. I wish to introduce a joint resolution to which nolody will object; it will explain itself on being read. It is very necessary to pass it immediately.

"By unanimous consent leave was given to introduce the joint resolution (S. No. 137) in relation to the property devised to the people of the United States by Capt. Urish P. Levy, deceased, and it was read the first time.

"It proposes to accept the devise and bequest of Capt. Levy of his Monticello farm in Virginia and his real estate in New York City in trust, to establish and maintain at Monticello an agricultural school for the education of the children of warrant officers of the Navy and to approint William M. Evarts, Erastus Corning, and Lewis B. Woodfurf, of New York, to receive the property and report their proceedings to the considerable amount of property—it is said to amount to about $200,000, including an estate at Monticello and a considerable estate in the city of New York—to the Government of the United States. The whole amount bequeathed, I am told, will reach that sum. The only question is whether Congress will accept it for the purposes therein named. It is for the consideration of Congress. I understand that if the United States refuse to accept it, then it is devised to the State of Virginia; and if they refuse to accept it, then to somehody else.

"Mr. Harris. We must accept a lawsuit with it. I understand the heirs are confesting the validity of the will.

"Mr. Fressender. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether there is any limitation as to the time within which the bequest mitted the transportance of the North West and the resolution isself. It was brought into the committee by the district altorney of New York. We had no time to examine it. He said-to me that it was believed the estate devised would amount to about $300,000. I

"So while the joint resolution in relation to the property devised to the people of the United States by Commodere Levy was still pending, and in less than a year, before the United States could take steps to accept or refuse the devise, though Commodore Levy had plainly directed in his will that his executors hold the whole of the property and estate devised and bequeathed in their hands until proper steps could be taken of privilege. Under the rules I was confined in my remarks by Congress to receive the same and discharge the executors, the executors of the will, it seems, brought an action 'to obtain a judicial construction of the testator's will' and to construe its meaning. Of course, to you and me, the meaning does not seem in doubt at all. But, any way, the case went to the court, and there it was decided on the technical ground of 'indefiniteness,' in New York general term, November 30, 1863, that Uriah P. Levy's wish, which was solemnly written in his will, must go for nothing, and the outcome of it was that Monticello came into the possession of Jefferson M. Levy, instead of the people of the United States, to whom it had been left in

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE WASHINGTON GORDON.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That there be a session of the House at 12 m. on Sunday, May 12, 1912, for the delivery of eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. George Washington Gorbon, late a Member of this House from the tenth congressional district of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279-the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279, with Mr. Hay in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole

House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] 30 minutes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday I rose to a question of privilege to correct a statement in the public press wherein it was charged that in my speech on the 4th instant I had reflected upon the integrity of the House. After I had yielded the floor the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was recognized to make a statement, and he proceeded, without provocation or excuse, to speak in a very sarcastic and fretful manner and to criticize me and my antigraft bill pending before the committee of which he is chairman.

The gist of the bill is to prohibit Senators and Representatives from acting as the officers, agents, and attorneys of corporations and from receiving gifts, fees, employment, or compensation from corporations and others interested in legislation. The purpose and the terms of the bill are plain and should be approved or disapproved by Members according to whether or not they consider the measure expedient or salutary.

I did not know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAY-TON] had any ill will toward me or ill feeling concerning the bill which I introduced. The petulance of his manner was surprising, and the savagery of his attack upon my antigraft bill was something wonderful to behold. I did not have an opportunity to reply at the time, and have not since until the present moment. I do not propose to descend to the same level occupied by the gentleman from Alabama, but with due respect to this House and all its Members I desire to make courteous answer consistent with the dignity and importance of the subject and the high character of those responsible for its rightful solution.

The charge in the Washington Post of April 6 attributed to me the statement in my speech of Thursday, April 4, on my antigraft bill, that-

Nearly every Member of the House and Senate is "approachable."

The word "approachable" was in quotation marks, and it was clearly meant that I had used the language in a sense that involved moral turpitude and that practically all the Members of the Congress and Senate could be bribed.

This statement is absolutely without foundation, involved the honor and dignity of the House and Congress, and it was clearly my duty to correct it, which I did, rising to a question to the question of privilege alone, which did not include an argument on the merits of my bill. In denouncing the statement as utterly untrue, I did not attribute to the party making it any desire to misrepresent or injure me. Subsequent publications in the same paper and some other papers, however, have changed my mind on this question, and I am constrained to believe that the charge was deliberately made in accordance with an organized plan of the recipients and beneficiaries of graft to incense the Members of Congress and the people of the country by attributing to me such an outrageous and sweeping charge against the integrity of the Congress and thus diverting attention from the merits of the measure I advocate. [Applause.]

If the newspaper statement had been merely an honest misunderstanding or mistake, all decent and honorable persons would have been glad to have made the correction. Instead of this being done, however, the country has been told, in substance, by that same paper and others, that I made an effort to apologize to the House, which was not favorably received. I made no apology. None was needed. I was guilty of no impropriety.

Since that time I have been credibly informed that it has been whispered about that while my speech in the RECORD did not reflect on the honor of the Members it was because the RECORD had been changed and the objectionable word eliminated.

Knowing that this also was false I requested the official reporters to make a certificate in reference to the facts, which has been done. This is the certificate:

has been done. This is the certificate:

We hereby certify that as official reporters of debates in the House of Representatives we reported the speech of Hon. CHOICE B. RANDELL, delivered by him on Thursday, April 4, 1912, on the bill (H. R. 8158) to prevent graft by prohibiting the giving or receiving of gifts, employment, or compensation from certain corporations by Senators, Representatives, Delegates, or Resident Commissioners in the Congress of the United States, or Senators, Representatives, Delegates, or Resident Commissioners elect, and the judges and justices of the United States courts, and prescribing penalties therefor.

That we have examined the original notes of said speech and that he did not therein say that nearly every Member of the House and Senate is "approachable"; that he did not say in that speech, in respect to any Member of the House, that he was "approachable," and that he did not in that speech use the word "approachable," Fixed Irland.

GEO. C. LAFFERTY, JOHN D. CREMER.

That is signed by the official reporters who reported my speech and had it transcribed from their notes.

I can not understand why anyone but the interests themselves and their hirelings could be inspired to invent and publish such an indecent, slanderous, and libelous falsehood. care nothing for the ill will or slanders of the grafters who would traduce me, but I do not propose by any fault or omission on my part to forfeit my right to the good will and esteem of the Congress and the country. Neither shall the opposition to my measure, which seeks to remove the hurtful influences which hover about the Capitol, succeed in dodging the issue and diverting your attention and the attention of the country from the real questions involved. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Alabama, inspired by some motive or purpose, when accorded recognition to make a statement, blindly or otherwise, presumed to assume that my remarks were objectionable, although he could not name the words nor the sentence that was objectionable. He then proceeded to denounce my antigraft bill by words, and in a manner indicating a deep interest and feeling on the subject. He not only denounced the provisions of the bill as absurd, but he was so completely under the control of some compelling motive that, despite the rules of decorum and the privileges of the House, he by innuendo ascribed my motives in reference to the introduction and advocacy of my bill to a desire for mere political effect in my home State.

Had such a charge been both well founded and provoked it would scarcely have been excusable for the chairman of the great Judiciary Committee to have been so undignified as to have made it on the floor of the House, but, with neither foundation in fact nor provocation of any kind for such utterance, we must look for some other source of inspiration in order to divine his purpose. Did he have a purpose, or was his mind a blank, like the boy who "whistled as he went for want of thought."

We have many new Members who are, perhaps, not acquainted with the history of this measure, and in order to get a fair understanding of the situation and the attitude of the Democratic and Republican Parties toward this bill it will be instructive to recount briefly the running fight in the Congress that has taken place during the last 10 years.

In the year 1900 I was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress as a Member of this House, and have been continuously re-elected by my constituents. I wondered why the legislative department of the Government was so unresponsive to the will of the people. I came to the conclusion, as did many others, that the beneficiaries of selfish and unwise legislation, especially the public-service corporations and other large financial institutions, were in close touch with legislators, both national and State. Gifts, fees, privileges, employment, and compensation were things that were very generally bestowed and received. came to the conclusion that the law should prohibit such gifts, employment, and fees. One class of gifts was the free pass; another telegraph franks, and such favors covered, probably, the whole available field.

Many patriotic Members expressed the belief that, although free passes and such favors should be abolished, it would be impossible to do it. We began, however, an organized effort to advance this reform and met every opportunity in that direction. Under the rules of the House it was seldom any such measure could be presented. The first opportunity occurred during the consideration of a bill to regulate the salaries and expenses of Federal judges. Acting with the leadership of my party in the House, I offered an amendment prohibiting Federal judges from receiving gifts, free transportation, or franks from any railroad, steamboat, express, or telegraph company.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Babcock, then a Member of this House, endeavored to ridicule the amendment, and proposed an amendment to my amendment, making it apply to Members of Congress as well as to Federal judges. I did not include Members of Congress because it would have made my amendment subject to a point of order. I immediately, however, accepted the amendment, and it was necessary for the gentle-man from Illinois [Mr. Mann] to come to the rescue of his colleague, and raise the point of order on the Babcock amendment, which was sustained. The House was overwhelmingly Republican, and the vote on roll call stood ayes 87, noes 114.

This was considered at the time a surprisingly good start. It was readily understood that the abolition of free transportation and franks for the judiciary meant the loss of perquisites to Congressmen as well. Hence the amendment was voted down. Eighty-seven Democrats, however, went on record in favor of this honest reform, and never since that time, according to my recollection, has the membership of this House ever permitted an aye and no vote on this or any similar question. Such a record is embarrassing to those who love to receive such favors.

We continued to be vigilant and strove on all occasions to make converts to the cause. In the early part of 1906, when the railroad-rate bill passed the House, an antifree-pass amendment failed, but public opinion and even the influence in the House was so strong that the patriotic element in the Senate succeeded in amending the bill with an antifree-pass provision.

When the railroad-rate bill went to the Senate and the attention of interested parties was concentrated there I earnestly and diligently pressed my antigift bill, which was pending before the Judiciary Committee of the House. In that bill I did not include fees or employment, being encouraged by the prospect of getting a favorable report to the House on a bill merely prohibiting gifts, franks, and privileges. We got a favorable report from the subcommittee, but when the full committee acted my bill failed on a tie vote. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. De Armond, late a Member of this House, was the ranking member on the Democratic side on the Judiciary Committee. Without reflecting upon anyone, would to God that that great man were here to be the chairman of that great committee to-day. [Applause.]

His plan, and mine, was to get the bill prohibiting gifts reported to the House and add an amendment prohibiting fees and employment when it came up in the House. Our plans failed, as before stated, on a tie vote. Watching every opportunity, the next which presented itself was in January, 1908, when, in the Committee of the Whole, the codification of the criminal law was being considered, I offered to amend, in accordance with the provisions of my antigraft bill. Quite a lengthy debate ensued, the Democrats favoring my amendment and the Republicans opposing it.

Our distinguished Speaker, Mr. Clark, who was then in charge of the Democratic forces, spoke in favor of my amendments. Among other things, he said:

I will tell you what I believe about public men. I think they are more honest than they get credit for, to begin with. [Applause,] In the second place, I think that the man who holds a public office ought to be like Cæsar demanded his wife should be—absolutely above susto be like Casar demanded ... picton.

I will give you a sample of what I consider public honor. John Quincy Adams was one of the most disagreeable personages that ever sat in the White House, but he was thoroughly educated. He had an extremely delicate sense of honor, and I give him that credit and glory. When he was elected to the House after he was President he owned some stock in the old United States Bank, and he went immediately after his election and sold that stock, on the ground that there might be legislation involving the property of the United States Bank in Congress, and I commend his example to all of us. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, on account of my time being limited-and I am not making any complaint about it—I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting some extracts from speeches made by the Members of the House on various occasions in reference to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert certain extracts in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Our distinguished leader, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Underwood], now chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, made an able speech for the amendments, saying, among other things:

amendments, saying, among other things:

The mind and the will of the Representative in Congress should be solely for the interests of his constituency and the people of the United States, and it is no reflection on the membership of this House if you eliminate everything that might go to bias or influence that judgment. There are influences that may be brought to bear on a Member of Congress that involve moral turpitude. [Applause.]

There are influences that may be brought to bear on a Member of Congress in which the idea of moral turpitude is entirely eliminated, but in some cases the influences that do not involve moral turpitude are more far-reaching, more dangerous, more effective to sway the notion of this body from that which their constituency desires than influences that do involve moral turpitude.

The influences I have convenented are influences for more

The influences I have enumerated are influences far more dangerous and far-reaching, as the gentleman from Alabama well said, than those involving moral turpitude—the relations between the attorney and his client, the official and his employee, the beneficiary and his benefactor, the friend with his friend, the associate with his associate.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] concluded a strong argument with these words:

We ought to adopt this amendment in order to remove the human temptation to err as far from the people's servants as possible. To that end, sir, I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] will be adopted.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hardy], in concluding an eloquent appeal for the adoption of the amendment, said:

You can use your weapon of ridicule and you can use your argument of demagogy, but the people's reform goes on and the time must come when the people's representatives will not undertake to serve two masters.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] made a stirring address on the Democratic side. Among other things he said:

I feel sure that no member of the committee would oppose the amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas, nor do I believe that any Member of this House would oppose or vote against either one of these amendments if they were offered as original independent legislation. To read the amendments is to approve every letter, word, sentence, and paragraph of them.

It is a noteworthy fact that these statements that I have read and many of the others that I will put in the RECORD were greeted with applause by Democrats in this House.

In concluding the arguments on the Democratic side I said. turning to the Republican side:

turning to the Republican side:

Is it not a fact that you propose that the evil shall not be reached? If you are going to reach it, how are you going to reach it? Are you in favor of public-service corporations employing Members of Congress and paying them salaries? Are you in favor of it? Then say so, and tell your constituents that, and you will not come back to this House. But you tell your constituents that you are for the people and against Members taking pay and gifts from corporations, and yet you come here and vote for the public-service corporations. I am here to lecture no man, but when the leader on the other side of this House speaks about legislation like this as demagogical it is time he should be answered in the proper spirit. The demagoguery is on that side of the House and the graft is on that side of the House. The proposed remedy is on this side of the House and the opposition to it is on that. A solid Democratic vote for this legislation and a solid Republican vote against it.

These amendments were fought bitterly and stubbornly by the leading Republicans, notable among whom were the gen-tleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Moon, the gentleman from New York, Mr. Payne, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Kiefer, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Denby, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Boutell, and a number of others.

The first vote, on a division, showed 80 for the amendment and 60 against it. The committee again divided, and the tellers announced ages 88, noes 109, and so the amendment was re-periodiced; but 88 good Democrats had emphasized the stand Democracy had taken on this subject. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] offered an amendment in derision of the measure, which provided in effect that no Member of Congress should be permitted to do anything at all under penalty of being hanged by the neck until dead, and thereafter be prohibited from holding any office of profit or trust under the Government of the United States.

I understand the gentleman, who is now a Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, is quite favorably inclined toward this measure. I do not know whether he has had a change of heart, or whether—judging him from the standpoint of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]-he is losing his mind which is sought will soon become the law of the land.

In that memorable session in 1909, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was before Congress, I introduced a resolution with the consent and under the direction of our leader, Mr. CLARK, requiring the Speaker to appoint the Judiciary Committee, declaring it was necessary to organize that committee in order that my antigraft bill could be reported and passed, making it unlawful for Senators and Representatives to be the officers, agents, and attorneys of incorporated and predatory wealth, or to receive gifts, fees, or employment from them or others in-terested in legislation. This was a privileged motion. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] now the leader on the Republican side of this House, promptly moved to table my resolution, which was done by a strict party vote—ayes 151, noes 100. Thus, 100 stalwart Democrats in solid phalanx, supporting their splendid leader, declared to the country the position of the Democrats on this question and exposed Republican methods. [Applause.]

And still another battle was fought on the 14th of June, 1910. Acting on the advice and instruction of our leader, Mr. Clark of Missouri, I introduced a resolution asking that my antigraft bill be taken from the Judiciary Committee, of which the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Parker, was chairman, alleging that the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the subcommittee having the bill in charge and the controlling element of the committee were interested parties, who would lose valuable employment if the antigraft bill became a law, and alleging, therefore, that they were incompetent and improper persons to consider the measure, and asking that the committee be instructed to immediately report the bill back to the House for further consideration thereon by the House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged. After considerable acrimonious debate, Mr. Speaker Cannon, in the chair, sustained the point of order, which ruling was probably technically correct, but the attention of the country had again been called to the Democratic insistence of this necessary reform, which seeks to divorce the trusts from the Congress and the courts. The result of the election which soon followed no doubt demonstrated the approval of the country of this and other Democratic reform measures, which, together with the universal disapproval of Republican perfidy in the so-called tariff revision, had much to do with the overthrow of the Republicans and the ascendency of the Democrats in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Many of the standpat Republicans who have fought this measure, including the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, have been repudiated by their constituency. Reactionary Democrats at both ends of the Capitol have been defeated or compelled to retire from public life. The cause of liberty may be temporarily thwarted, but its defeat is always temporary only. To say that the lawmaking power should be disinterested as well as able and honest is expressing a truism, and yet the contrary is the position of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr.

CLAYTON 1.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining, please?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining. Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask the courtesy of the House to extend my time for, say, 20 minutes. I wish to discuss the measure. Can the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Finley] extend my time for 20 minutes, or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon]?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I regret to tell the gentleman that owing to the number of gentlemen who desire to speak on the bill I can give him only 10 minutes after the expiration of his

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has not yet expired. He has five minutes yet remaining.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand, then, that I am recognized for 15 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more than he originally had. Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted it will be impossible for me to discuss at any length the criticism that has been made of my bill by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Clayton]. I will take it up as briefly as possible, and call attention to some of the salient points that he makes, and will extend my remarks, perhaps, somewhat in the RECORD in reference to the bill.

In the first place, I am quite sure the chairman of the committee claims a great deal more authority for himself than he is entitled to. I do not believe he spoke for the members of that committee. There has been no trouble between me and the committee. Never an unkind word has passed. His attack was like a thunderboit from a clear sky, and I do not believe that his statement, which he says every member of the committee would indorse, would be approved by them. Not only that, but his threat that I would hear from the committee falls upon deaf ears, because every member of the committee who read my remarks knows full well that there was no complaint made about them and nothing said to which they could take exception.

But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Clayton] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Davis] have prepared a criticism of my bill. In the first place they say that all that is of any value in the proposition is already included in the law. To characterize that statement as wild scarcely expresses it. The present law does not cover the reforms which we advocate. We provide in this bill that any free transportation of person or property, or frank, franking privilege, or money or other thing of value shall not be given by corporations and others interested in legislation to any Member of Congress or any judge of a Federal court. The criticism here made by them is—

We have analyzed it, and we find that all that is in the bill that would be wise is now the law. For instance, the matter of "free passes." That is a restricted term. The gentleman from Texas does not want free passes to be given. The law already prevents transportation companies from furnishing transportation, a broader term than "free passes," to which the gentleman would narrow the terms of the existing law.

That is a criticism that comes from the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Davis], who also is a member of the committee.

You can not find the words "free passes" in the bill! It prohibits any free transportation of person or property, or any frank or franking privilege, or gift of money or anything of value. This provision is the same in each clause. Yet in this carefully prepared statement one of the principal criticisms is that I would limit the bill to "free passes." The gist of the measure is against a gift. Why say they shall not give you a pass or a frank? Because it might possibly be construed that that was a privilege, as distinguished from a gift of personal property or money. Therefore, in order to include it, the provisions of the bill were drawn as they are. There is nothing restrictive about it.

But they follow that statement with the statement that my bill is as broad and includes as much as God Almighty's universe. The crificism is just like other criticisms of my position in this matter. There are some of them who say the bill does not include enough, that it does not go far enough, and they will fight it on that ground. Then others say it includes too much, and they will fight it on that ground. Why can not lawyers see the real issue and incorporate in the bill terms which might sait them better?

But, Mr. Chariman, they say that this is new legislation; a new idea in law. Why, cir, the pernicious effect of gifts was recorded in Holy Writ. The law in ancient times commanded, "Thou shalt receive no gift." Why? "For a gift blindeth the eyes and perverteth the words of the righteous." In the Scrmon on the Mount He who spake as never man spake said, "No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will cleave to the one and despise the other. Ye can not serve God and mammon." Yet they say this is new. The gentleman should look to the Constitution of this Republic. In Article I, section 9, subdivision 8, we find this prohibition:

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State.

If the gentlemen who oppose this measure had been in that convention they would have said that they might not be able to receive a box of cigars from the King of England. This provision was not for the purpose of preventing some one from getting a box of cigars, as the learned gentlemen seem to think, neither is my bill drawn for that purpose. If, technically, such a gift comes within its provisions, so it does within the provisions of the Constitution. At that time the danger to our freedom was from without—from the interference of kings, princes, and potentates, and hence gifts from them to our officials were prohibited, except by the consent of the Congress. If that constitutional convention were in session to-day, inspired by the same motive, they would put in the organic law that no man who was a Member of Congress or the judge of a court—and I believe they would go further than my bill does and include practically every officer of the Government—should receive gifts, fees, compensation, or employment from the great corporations and others interested in legislation. [Applause.]

However that may be, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I will extend my criticism in my remarks, in order that Members of the House may see it; and I would like for every Member to consider this matter, because it is of great importance.

In conclusion I wish to say that the people who stand for this measure are not interested in demagogery. The gentleman has no right to impute any motive to me. The people of my State have sent me to Congress, and I want to know—and I want the people of his district, the great State of Alabama, the sister State of Georgia, where I was born and reared—I want all true Democrats to know and consider the situation. When this gentleman, who has been the chairman of the National Democratic convention, twice chairman of the Democratic caucus of this House, who is now Democratic chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, sees proper to rise in his place and attribute a motive like he did to me for introducing this bill, which has been a Democratic measure in this House for nearly 10 years, I say I want all good Democrats to consider the facts in regard to it.

Furthermore, I am responsible to my constituents, and it might enlighten the gentleman some, if he cares to know, that time and time again the people who sent me here instructed me in the platform upon which I was elected to introduce the measure, and I followed their instructions when I did it. [Applause I

That explanation will not interest all the influences outside of Congress that have improper motives; it will not suit the grafters, nor their beneficiaries, nor their benefactors; but it seems to me that it is an answer that in itself ought to show the impropriety of the gentlemen who have taken such a position as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the genleman from Texas has expired.

[Mr. JACKSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham].

Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to a statement made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Mann], near the end of his remarks yesterday, and which appears in the middle of page 4652 of the Record. I will read the remarks:

But when my colleague's attention was called to the fact that this lady had obtained $100 to represent Indians, and afterwards that the person who had paid the money became dissatisfied with the prospects and demanded the check back, I am informed by an affidavit, which is on file, that my colleague told Mrs. Grey to keep the money.

I regret that my colleague is not in his seat this morning. I hope he spoke unadvisedly or was not correctly reported. The language which he uses says that he is informed by an affidavit, clearly meaning that he has seen an affidavit to that effect, and that it is on file, but he does not say where, and that the affidavit informed him that his colleague—meaning myself—told Mrs. Grey to keep this money.

I want to say that this remark was made at the close of the debate, when I could not get time to answer it; indeed, I did not catch the full force of it then. I now want to say that it is absolutely and unqualifiedly false; that there is no foundation whatever for it, and that I would be entirely justified in using the shortest and ugliest word that I could think of in characterizing it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not at this time. I do not intend to charge the falsity of it to my colleague, but he is to some extent particeps criminis, because his language implies that he had seen the affidavit. And I call on him now to produce that affidavit. [Applause.] And when it is produced, if it states what he said it does, I repeat that it is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish my colleague would wait until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is on the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM. I had to take the time when I could get it, and I have not now time to repeat it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is now on the floor, and I ask that the gentleman be yielded time to repeat it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] that I was just calling attention to a statement in the RECORD, which I have read, while the gentleman was absent from his seat, to the effect that I had advised Mrs. Grey to keep a certain $100, which the gentleman said he saw, by an affidavit he had seen, that I had advised her to I state that that is absolutely untrue; that I never gave such advice; that she never talked to me about such a matter; and that I never talked to her about it. I now call upon the gentleman to produce that affidavit, and when produced, if it states what he says it does, I say the affidavit is false and the affiant is either mistaken or is a falsifier.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gen-theman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in August last, in the House Office Building, I believe, while attending a meeting of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, presided over by my colleague, Mr. Graham, Mrs. Grey met an Indian named Denomic, who had been attending the hearing on the White Earth Reservation before that committee. She solicited employment from him to represent the La Pointe Indians, and subsequently obtained a check from him for $100. Later the Indian became suspicious of what she could do and ordered payment of the check stopped. The check, however, was paid by the bank upon which it was drawn, through inadvertence. Mrs. Grey refused to pay back the amount. The cashier of the bank endeavored to secure the amount of the check which had been paid by the bank. The Indian declined to be responsible for the check, payment of which he had stopped. The bank subsequently credited his account with $100 and the cashier endeavored to get repayment of the same. In a conversation with the cashier of this bank, the Second National Bank of this city, Mrs. Grey stated that the reason she refused to pay the amount was that she had been advised by the chairman of the committee for which she was working, the Committee on Investigation of Expenditures in the Interior Department, not to refund the amount of the check.

This Indian made an affidavit that he met Mrs. Grey going to the Indian Office, and that she roundly chastised him, saying that she had seen some of her superiors, who advised her not to give him back his money, and that she was not going to give him one cent.

In the affidavit made by this Indian he also stated that Mrs. Grey warned him not to go near Mr. Stephens, the chairman of the Indian Committee, using language concerning Mr. Stephens which, being wholly unjustifiable, I shall not repeat on the floor of the House to be read into the RECORD. In the same affidavit the Indian stated that Mrs. Grey said that she could get whatever she wanted done by the Interior Department, and that she had Mr. Valentine, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under her thumb. The affidavit, I believe, is on file; at least I have had a copy of it.

Mr. RAKER. Where is it on file?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it is on file in the Indian Office. It was obtained by the people who were seeking to obtain back the money, I believe.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman mean that it is in some official file?

Mr. MANN. I do not now recall whether it is on file in the Indian Office, because I did not obtain my information from the Indian Office. I will say to the gentleman that I have a very complete file, which, if the gentleman desires, I shall be very glad to show to him. I would not care to read it into the Record, because it reflects unjustly, in my judgment, upon some people.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think that, inasmuch as this affidavit impeaches two Members of Congress and the Indian Department, it is not worthy of consideration on the floor of the House?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think that the evidence which I have already submitted to the House shows that Mrs. Grev was in some capacity connected with this committee, using her official position for the purpose of obtaining employment from those people who believed that because of such employment she would have superior influence, and that it is now the duty of my colleague, not only to disavow the statement made by Mrs. Grey, but to dispense with her services with a reprimand, if he has been-and I assume he has been-unacquainted with the facts in the case.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have time in which to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any other information on which to base the statement I read from the RECORD:

I am informed by an affidavit which is on file that my colleague told Mrs. Grey to keep the money.

Has the gentleman any other information on which to base this charge than the affidavit or paper from which he has now given us information?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the cashier of the Second National Bank of this city received the same information from Mrs. Grey.

Mr. GRAHAM. That would not be additional information with reference to my advising her. That is the question. Did the cashier of the bank say that he had knowledge that I so advised her?

Mr. MANN. Only what she said. Now, I will be frank with my colleague. I never supposed he advised Mrs. Grey on this employment.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did my colleague think himself justified in reading this statement or stating it into the Record yesterday in the form in which it there appears, clearly raising the inference that he believed I had done it?

Well, I have not seen what the RECORD shows. Mr. MANN.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have read it to you. You knew

Mr. MANN. I say now that Mrs. Grey was claiming to be an employee of the committee; that she received letters from the chairman of that committee, which, in my judgment, justified the claim; that she was constantly in attendance upon the committee; that she was used by the committee, and I have been informed that she was paid in a way-how I do not propose to say, but not out of public funds, and that while in this position she was using—I will not say was using her position—her pretended employment and seeking employment elsewhere where the employment and the subjects of the employment came within the scope of the investigation to be carried on by the committee. Now, in my judgment, I did not reflect upon the honesty of my colleague, and certainly would not.

Mr. GRAHAM. But my colleague did yesterday in this language.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not. I do not think I reflected upon his honesty. I stated the fact and he denied that he advised Mrs. Grey on the subject, and that denial was sufficient for me.

Mr. GRAHAM. My colleague asserts he knew, or at least he believed, I did not so advise before he made the statement; then was he candid in making the statement under those circumstances?

Mr. MANN. I have been candid in making the statement-

Mr. GRAHAM. I leave it to the House.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was within the right of the House to know what an employee of my colleague was saying in reference to her employment and saying in reference to the commit-I would like to know from my colleague why Mrs. Grey has been in attendance upon this committee; why she has been given superior rights over other people in connection with the work of that committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. The committee hearings are open; anyone who chooses has the right to attend them, and many people do attend them regularly. She could have done so; she was never there at the request of the committee.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman let me ask, Was she employed by the committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. She was not employed by the committee. I repeated that yesterday more than once.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Texas know how she

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to answer the gentleman more fully the question which he asked. The committee has a great deal of difficulty in getting from the Indian Bureau and the Department of the Interior the papers which are there which the committee ought to have. Mrs. Grey is exceedingly familiar with those papers and files. Calls we send there are not always promptly answered, and she has, at my suggestion, gone through these files and pointed out for us papers in the files in the department that the committee ought to have and has had some difficulty in locating. That is the extent of her service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the time extended as I would like to ask a question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes additional time to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I am informed, in fact I have noted in the hearings of the committee of which the gen-tleman from Illinois is chairman, this notation "Chairman so and so, and other members of the committee and Mrs. Grey, present.

Mr. GRAHAM. And a number of others.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, she is included among the official list of those present.

Mr. GRAHAM. No; those who were present generally were noted.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hearings do not purport to give the name of every stranger who happens to be in the room or witnesses who happen to be there.

Mr. GRAHAM. Nor has—— Mr. CAMPBELL. This is the official list that is published Mr. CAMPBELL. This is the official lis of every hearing of those who were present.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman is wrong. He is in error The clerk of the committee in the earlier sittings of it did make notation of nearly everybody who attended-the name of nearly every person who was present for a time. The clerk, under the direction of the chairman, has discontinued that practice.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

MANN] yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. I think they do not desire any more time.

Mr. Chairman, Mrs. Grey was present at the hearing before this committee on June 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, and 29, and at various hearings in July.

Mr. GRAHAM. Might I inquire what the matter under consideration then was?

Mr. MANN. I think it was an investigation of the Pima matters in Arizona.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think at that time there were other matters under consideration with which she had no more to do than any other citizen.

Mr. MANN. Subsequently she was present on various occasions while the White Earth matters were under investigation. On November 20 last this letter was sent:

Hon. Walter L. Fisher, Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ME. FISHER: Mrs. Helen P. Grey wishes to look through some records in the Land Office, and also in the office of the Reclamation Service for our committee. Will you kindly see that she is given the necessary permission?

Very sincerely, yours,

JAMES M. GRAIMA, Chairman, etc.

JAMES M. GRAHAM, Chairman, etc.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question? Mr. MANN. I will. Mr. HARDY. I want to know if the gentleman thinks it is wrong for the chairman of a committee or subcommittee to ask any favor in behalf of anybody who appears before his committee, either in favor of or against any legislation? I have done that with reference to men who came here employed to forward certain legislation before my committee and those who came employed to oppose that same legislation.

Mr. MANN. In February last Mrs. Grey wrote this letter, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1912.

Hon. R. G. Valentine,

Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

Sir: Under Mr. Graham's request of November 24, 1911, will you kindly furnish me with Senate Document No. 445, Sixtleth Congress, first session, parts 1 and 2, Crow Reservation, being hearings on Crow affairs, and oblige?

Yours, very truly,

Helen Pierce Grey.

To which this response was made to Mrs. Grey, as follows: FEBRUARY 3, 1912.

Mrs. Helen P. GREY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MADAM: In response to your request of this date I take pleasure in handling you the volume you ask for, being Senate Document No. 445. Sixtieth Congress, first session, parts 1 and 2, Crow Reservation, being hearings on Crow affairs.

As this appears to be the only volume left in our library, and the volume is one which the office may have frequent occasion to refer to, will you kindly return it to us at your earliest convenience?

Respectfully,

R. G. VALENTINE, Commissioner,

In September last, this telegram was received by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in Washington, dated September 13. 1911:

COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Washington, D. C.:

Mrs. H. P. Grey visited agency yesterday, stating intentions of returning. Claims to represent Graham committee, and authorized by you to investigate irrigation project. No credentials shown; wire inyou to invitormation.

RUSSELL, Principal in Charge.

To which this reply was sent:

RUSSELL, Principal in Charge:

Your telegram 13th. Extend Mrs. Grey every official courtesy. Records of your office should be available for her information.

R. G. VALENTINE.

It should be remembered that Mrs. Grey, speaking and claiming to represent the Crow Indians at Casa Grande, while there denounced numerous persons connected with the Indian Service and Indian Affairs, particularly Mr. Brosious, and connected with the Indian Rights Association, boasted of her authority, and presumed to represent the Committee on Expenditures in the Indian Department.

In October last Mrs. Grey visited the Crow Agency in Mon-The superintendent wired the Indian Office that she was upon the reservation, and on October 23 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Valentine, sent the superintendent the following telegram:

Show Mrs. Helen P. Grey every official courtesy, offering her full oportunity to see office records and to study conditions on the reser-

In a letter to the Secretary dated in December-

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. In a letter to the Secretary dated December 18, 1911, Mrs. Grey wrote at considerable length to the Secretary of the Interior protesting against the employment of Kappler and Merillat as attorneys for the Crow Indians in Montana, opening her letter with the following

For and on behalf of the Crow Indians in the State of Montana, whose duly authorized and acting representative I am,

And so forth.

The letter is signed by Mrs. Grey as "Representative of the Crow Indians of Montana."

It will be noticed that the Crow Indians of Montana whom she claimed to represent were the Indians at the agency where she claimed to represent the committee and had received ausne claimed to represent the committee and had received authority from the superintendent in charge by direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to inspect everything there. Now, I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to have a complete copy of all the correspondence.

Mr. MANN. Not here; I have not.

Mr. GRAHAM. Has he among his files a telegram from the Indian Bureau to myself at Springfield. Ill. natifying me that Indian Bureau to myself at Springfield, Ill., notifying me that Mrs. Grey intended to visit the Crow Agency, and asking me if she was a representative of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and my reply to it?

Mr. MANN. I have.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it is hardly candid not to read that Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had not interrupted.

Mr. GRAHAM. You have passed the place where it fitted in.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.
Mr. GRAHAM. The date will show, if you will just turn back and refer to it. That is not frank of my colleague.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman to determine as to my frankness.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a right to express an opinion about it. Mr. MANN. He had better express his own frankness about somebody in his employ obtaining pay while representing some-body else than the Government of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask the gentleman to read the correspond-

Mr. MANN. I propose to read it.

Mr. GRAHAM. You could not very well get out of it now.
Mr. MANN. I could get out of it if I wanted to. I would not have to do it here if I did not want to read it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The date will show whether the gentleman intended to read it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to his colleague [Mr. GRAHAM]?

Mr. MANN. I do not yield for gratuitous nonsense like that. On October 16, 1911—

Mr. GRAHAM. May I interrupt the gentleman there to ask him if he had not passed on to December?

Mr. MANN. Not at this point, because I wished to connect Mrs. Grey as a representative of the Crow Indians, which I have done, by her own letter, stating that she was the representative of the Crow Indians at the very time-I do not know whether my colleague knew it or not; he ought to have known it—that she was, through his influence, receiving special favors. OCTOBER 16, 1911.

Hon. JAMES M. GRAHAM,

Hon. James M. Grahan,
Springfield, Ill.:

Helen Pierce Grey has notified office that she intends to visit Crow Reservation Wednesday, 18th instant, but omitted to state whether representative of your committee. Please advise office whether she is representing Committee on Expenditures for the Interior Department on this visit, in order that office may wire proper instructions to reservation superintendent.

F. H. ABBOTT, Assistant Commissioner.

To which this answer was sent-Mr. GRAHAM. The date, please?

Mr. MANN. I presume it is the same date. The date is not on here:

F. H. Abbot. Assistant Commissioner, Washington, D. C.:

Our committee has not authorized any one as its representative to Crow Reservation, but if Mrs. Grey has any relevant information I feel sure that the committee will be glad to have it.

That is very much like another telegram which my colleague sent. When Mrs. Grey was in Arizona somebody wired to my colleague—I think it was the editor of one of the papers there—asking whether Mrs. Grey was authorized to speak for the committee. My colleague replied:

SAMUEL W. SMALL. Editor Sun, Phoenia, Ariz.:

Mrs. Grey has no authority to speak regarding the committee's intentions. Only a majority of the members can do that.

That was signed by my colleague. No disavowal of the authority of Mrs. Grey as representing the committee, but a statement of "only the majority of the members of the committee can speak regarding the committee's intentions.

Mr. RAKER. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. MANN. It did not need a telegram to inform anybody in the country that an employee of the committee can not speak for the committee; that an individual member of the committee can not speak for the committee; that the chairman of the committee can not speak for the committee without the authority of a majority of the members of the committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentle-

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to his use of the term "employee of the con nittee," his colleague, the chairman of the committee, states most positively that she has not been an employee of the committee; and it does seem to me that there is a very acute issue there as between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. MANN. It may be that my colleague has stated that Mrs. Grey was not an employee of the committee, but if he has it has escaped my attention.

I understood a few moments ago, when the Mr. GARNER. gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked him the question, whether or not she was employed by the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] answered most positively that she was not, and he made that statement twice yesterday

Mr. MANN. I did not so understand him yesterday to state that Mrs. Grey had not been employed by the committee. I understood him to say that Mrs. Grey had not been paid out

Mr. GARNER. I fall to understand how a person is an employee of the committee when the committee is conducting an investigation and the expense of the conduct of that investigation and examination is paid out of public funds.

Mr. MANN. Whether or not they will be paid out of the public funds I do not know. I know that several people have claimed to have been employed by that committee-one who received $200 and claimed that he should have received $1,000. I asked if the man was employed by the committee. I received the impression-I will not say that the statement was made, but I received the impression from the statement that was made—that the man was not employed by the committee, but subsequently I learned that he had presented a bill for $1,000 and had received $200 on account.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I want to state—
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from California, who has interrupted me several times, and then I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] wants to ask a question, I will withdraw.

Mr. MANN. Then I shall not yield to the gentleman later. I can not afford to fritter away my time. I yield to my colleague now.

Mr. RAKER. All right.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that the statement of my colleague [Mr. Mann] as to his information has paid out no public money to anyone claiming to be an employce and no such bill was ever presented to any member of the committee by anybody.

Mr. MANN. Did not this attorney down here claim that he was to be paid $1,000?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know what he claimed. Mr. MANN. I have heard the statement that he did claim that he was to be paid $1,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. He made no such claim to me.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not know to whom the gentleman refers. I presume he is referring to a gentleman by the name of Fennell.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman, and it was in connection with that celebrated Controller Bay investigation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If you will take the printed hearings you will find in the record, made under the supervision, I presume, of the chairman of the committee, that in addition to those who were in attendance at the hearings constituting the committee, Mr. Fennell appeared as attorney or counsel for the committee.

Mr. MANN. I remember that. The printed record attracted my attention, because at that time the committee had been given no authority to employ an attorney or anybody else. After reading the hearings that came from the committee, showing that Mr. Fennell was there as the attorney for the committee, I asked for information on the subject.

Mr. GRAHAM. Just as Mr. Easby-Smith will appear in the hearings now going on as the attorney, but without compensation from the committee.

Mr. MANN. Has not Mr. Fennell been paid any compensation?

Mr. GRAHAM. He has not received a dollar of the people's money.

Mr. MANN. Has he not been paid $200?

Mr. GRAHAM. He has not received any of the people's money.

Mr. MANN. All I can say is that I was informed by a member of the Committee on Accounts that he had received $200 through the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no way in which the committee can pay out money except on proper vouchers.

Mr. MANN. Who is paying these men? That is what I want to know. Who is paying Mrs. Grey? Nobody seems willing to give that information. Who paid the attorney who appeared on the record as the attorney for the committee? Who is paying the attorney now who appears in the record as the attorney for the committee? Is it the people who are being investigated? That is what I want to know.

Mr. GRAHAM. If public-spirited citizens offer him compensation, it is nobody else's affair.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is the affair of Congress. We are quite able and willing to pay the necessary expenses of these investigations. We have already paid nearly $100,000 and within the last two days have authorized the expenditure of nearly $75,000 more; and yet the gentleman assumes that we are too poor to pay an attorney for the committee. Who does pay the attorney?

Mr. GRAHAM. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Yes.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Mr. GRAHAM. In the case of the senatorial investigation from our State were there not attorneys employed on both sides, some of whom represented the public and some of whom represented private persons?

Mr. MANN. There were attorneys employed by the committee and paid out of the public funds to represent the com-People who were under contest had their attorneys employed, as people have the right to have attorneys represent them before the gentleman's committee, but in that contest the attorneys for the committee are paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and no man could justify a private individual in paying the fees of the attorneys for the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, on August 14 last Mrs. Grey wrote a letter to an Indian, William Obern, of Odanah, Wis., stating that in the papers given her by one Denomie she finds an application of his for competency, and in her letter to this Indian she said:

I am at present employed by the committee of the House that is investigating the Indian Bureau, having on now an investigation of the Apaches of Arizona and also the White Earths of Minnesota. Both of these investigations were brought to the committee by me and I am working with one of the attorneys of the Department of Justice who has charge of the prosecution of the White Earth Reservation in Minnesota.

She offered this Indian to look after his application, to have that a certain gentleman received $200 and presented a bill his restrictions removed, on the condition that he agree to pay for $1,000 is not correct. The committee, as I stated yesterday, her $150, and sent him an agreement to that effect and requested him to execute it. In the same letter she solicited employment to represent the tribe as a whole, asking for $10 a day and her Let my colleague disayow that Mrs. Grey has been employed by the committee. In November last she met one of the messengers of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and asked him to find a certain Indian that was in the office by the name of Standing Bear, who had an application for a patent in fee pending before the office, and solicited employment by the Indian. She had the case of the brother of this Indian and received money from him, and, as I am informed, stated to one of them that she was employed by the committee investigating the Indian business place?

Mr. MANN. This last took place in the Indian Office, where Mrs. Grey was occupying a desk under the supposition that by the letter of the chairman of that committee she was employed, representing in some capacity the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM. May I ask the gentleman if that is the letter that my colleague has read?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Can my colleague see in that letter any such authority or any foundation for his statement?

Mr. MANN. I can say that if the gentleman had given me a letter of that sort and I had presented it and informed the people to whom I presented it that I was employed by the committee, that printed records of the daily proceedings of the committee giving attention to the fact that I was in attendance on the committee and rendering service to the committee, I would expect that they would assume that I was employed by the committee.

Was Mrs. Grey employed by the committee? Who has paid her? If the gentleman does not know we ought to have an investigation to find out. If he does know, he ought to fact an investigation to find out. If he does know, he ought to state it frankly to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, during my absence from the Chamber yesterday a resolution authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department to make certain investigations and expenditures in connection therewith was considered, and during the debate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] made this statement:

When this committee went to make the investigation called the White Earth investigation I did not think that the chairman of that committee treated the minority fairly. There are three minority members upon the committee, and the chairman of the committee was notified that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] could not attend on the trip which the committee made to the Northwest, because his duties required him, in his opinion, to remain in the House, an opinion in which I concurred. I do not believe it is fair for the chairman of a committee appointing a subcommittee to purposely appoint as a minority member of that committee one who has notified him he can not attend.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] a little later, in reply to his colleague, said:

Mr. Speaker, I want first to answer my colleague's statement with reference to the personnel of the subcommittee which went to Minnesota. The gentleman's statement with reference to the manner of the selection of the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL, as a member of that committee has certainly been made under a misapprehension and does not conform to the facts. Mr. MONDELL was ranking member of the minority upon our committee. As ranking member the chairman of the committee understood that it was the custom and that it was the right of Mr. MONDELL to be named as the minority member of the subcommittee. He was so named. At the time his name was informally mentioned as the minority member of the committee Mr. MONDELL said that he did not see how he could go, but he did not positively decline to go. He did later write a letter, not declining to serve, but tendering his resignation.

that he did not see now he to go. He did later write a letter, not declining to serve, but tendering his resignation.

That letter reached me in Minneapolis, and I at once answered, regretting his determination not to act with us, and stating that I did not think I had any power individually to act upon that resignation, and that it would be presented to the full committee at the carllest practical moment. That was done, the resignation was withdrawn, and Mr. Mondell is still a member of that subcommittee because he did not press his resignation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel confident that no one desires to make a misstatement in regard to this matter, but possibly there are some who need to have their memories refreshed in regard to it. In the first place, I call attention to the fact that the resolution authorizing the White Earth investigation, which is the one referred to, was before the House on January 9, and in discussing that resolution I said:

to wander afield to Minnesota and to the far confines of the Sacaton Reservation while Congress is in session. I conceive it to be my duty to be here, guarding and caring for the interests of my constituency.

That, I thought, was a clear statement of my position. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MONDELL. Certainly. Mr. MANN. That was before the subcommittee had been appointed.

Mr. MONDELL. That was before the subcommittee had been appointed.

Mr. MANN. When the matter was up for consideration in the House, and my colleague from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] was present, in reference to his own resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. Later; a few days later; possibly the next day—I do not recall the exact date—the matter of the appointment of a subcommittee was taken up before the full committee, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] suggested that he had it in his mind to appoint me a member of the subcommittee. I reminded him of the statement that I had made on the floor of the House, and then at some length, desiring to be entirely courteous, to have him fully understand that I would be glad to serve if it were possible for me to do so, I explained to him and to the full committee the character of the duties that I conceived required my presence here. I said that it would, under those circumstances, be impossible I said that it would, under those circumstances, be impossible for me to serve. At that time the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Burkel], a member of the committee, suggested that if the matter was left to the minority members of the committee we would select a Member to serve upon that subcommittee, or words to that effect. The chairman of the committee the gentleman from Ulivie [Mr. Carrent] and the mittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham], said that he did not understand that the rule which prevailed in the House under which the minority selected its membership on committees applied to such a case, leaving us to infer that he expected to make the appointment.

There was a subsequent meeting of the committee, either the day following or two or three days later, when the matter of the appointment of the subcommittee was again taken up. I again explained at some length, and I thought my friend from Illinois was somewhat irritated at the length of time I took to explain that while I had no desire to evade any duty as a member of the committee my duties were such that I felt I could not leave the city. In order to be certain that I was not refusing a duty that I should perform under the ordinary usages of the House, I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] whether in his opinion, under the circumstances, there was any obligation on my part to serve. He said in substance, as I recollect, that if my duties were such that in my opinion could not leave without neglecting them, I was under no obligation to go, that some one else could and should under those circumstances be appointed. When, for the second time, in the committee I explained why I could not go, I stated to the chairman that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Burke] was much more familiar with the matters that were to be investigated than I was; that he had been chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and knew all about these White Earth Indian matters; that I knew nothing of them; that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA], a member of the committee, was also familiar with these matters; and that either of these gentlemen could serve very much more acceptably than I could on the committee; and that one or the other of them would go, I was confident.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Wyoming know anything about the employment of Mrs. Grey by the committee?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for the present, I prefer not to touch upon that.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, we are unable to hear the gentleman from Illinois, and I would like to know what his question was

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply asked the gentleman from Wyoming whether he as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department knew anything about the employment of Mrs. Grey by the committee?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I may refer to that, if I have time, but for the present I desire to continue the discussion of the matter in hand.

As emphatically as I felt I could—and I believe I can be emphatic on occasions and still be courteous and decent in my Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee authorized to go forth and conduct investigations under this resolution, I want to protest against that portion of the resolution which proposes that the committee carry on its investigations in distant regions during the sessions of the House. As a Member of this House I have found that my duties here are quite sufficient to keep me occupied at all times while Congress is in session. I have no time as a member of that committee received a letter from the chairman of the committee announcing my appointment as a member of the subcommittee. I immediately, within the hour, dictated an answer. I am not absolutely certain that that answer was mailed that day. It was written that day, but I recall that I made one or two changes in the letter, and it is barely possible that it was not mailed until the next morning, but it was dated the 18th.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman. Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my answer, which I shall put in the Record, was written and dated the same day that I received the letter from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. and in that answer I reviewed briefly what I had said at the time the matter was under consideration, what I had said in the committee, and expressed my surprise that under the circumstances I should have been appointed. I am not sure whether that letter was mailed or sent to the room of the chairman, but at any rate it left my office in less than 24 hours, and I think in less than 6 hours of the time I received the first notice, and the only notice that I ever had that I had actually been appointed on the subcommittee.

I discussed that matter with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] at the time, because I was not certain as to which was the proper procedure-to decline to serve or to resign; and I think on the advice of the gentleman from Illinois I wrote my letter as a resignation from the subcommittee. In reply to that I received the next day a letter from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] stating that he was sorry I could not serve, but that it was too late to change the arrangements. In the statement that the gentleman made yesterday he said my resignation was withdrawn and I was still a member of the subcommittee because I did not press my resignation. All that has ever been said in regard to the matter, as he will recall, is that after he and the other member of the subcommittee who served returned from Minnesota the chairman one day referred to my letter of resignation and the fact that it had not been accepted. My recollection is that he said that in view of the fact that the investigation was practically over he supposed that it was not necessary to take any action in the matter. To that I made no reply whatever that I can now recall except perhaps to remark I presumed that was so. I did not feel that anything was to be gained by further discussing the matter and did not care to do so. I have never attended a meeting of that subcommittee except-

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Except that one day I passed the room in which the subcommittee was in session and saw in the room a gentleman whom I desired to talk to for a moment, and I went into the committee room and sat perhaps for five minutes during the hearings; but I have never served on that subcommittee; I have never considered myself a member of it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is not the gentleman mistaken as to the length of time he stayed with the committee on the occasion to which he referred?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it may have been more than five minutes. I wanted to talk with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to a matter and had intended to go to his office and see him, and I happened to pass by the room and saw he was in there, or learned he was. I went in and waited some little time-I think during the time that he was being examined-and then left the committee room. I sat there merely as a spectator for certainly not to exceed 10 minutes, and I imagine not that long.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did not the gentleman ask some questions while there?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall; as a spectator I may have, but I do not recall. I think not.

Mr. GRAHAM. I mean as a member of the committee and not as a spectator.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I certainly did not, because the gentleman himself knows that in conversation he said that, as a matter of fact, there would be no object in my sitting with the committee, even if I desired to do so, in view of the fact that the investigation was practically over; and the gentleman knows, and everybody else knows who knows anything about it, that I resigned from that committee and I have not served on it a minute. I now recall that on the occasion referred to former Commissioner Leupp was interrogating Commissioner Valentine. I am quite sure I did not say a word.

Mr. GRAHAM. In the first place, the gentleman declines to assent to the statement just made and his recollection is different from that of the gentleman from Wyoming, that the chairman of the committee did not make the statement just now used that it was not necessary for the gentleman to sit with the committee, that its labors were nearly concluded, but, on the contrary, requested the gentleman from Wyoming to stay with the committee and serve with it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is entirely immaterial whether that be the gentleman's recollection or not. I do not propose to be placed in the attitude of passing back and forth contradictions as to just what was said. The fact remains—

Mr. GRAHAM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. MONDELL. I do not yield—that, in the first place, I repeatedly declared that I could not serve on the subcommittee. I and other members of the committee asked the chairman to allow us to select, or asked that he should select, some other minority member to serve on that subcommittee. He declined to do so, though he never told me positively that he would, absolutely against my will and wish, appoint me, and I never knew that I was appointed until I received that letter of January 18, that I will print in the Record, which was imme-I have never served on the subcommittee diately answered. and have never been near the subcommittee except on that occasion, when I went into the committee room for the purpose of speaking to a gentleman who was there, and did not remain to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield? would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact before the subcommittee went to Minnesota and during the special session of Congress last summer there were a number of hearings on the White Earth matters. There had been as a matter of fact several hearings on White Earth matters.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there had been many hearings, and they were varied.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, on the White Earth matter, and the gentleman was in Wyoming during most of that time.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not now recall I was present, although I may have been at a White Earth hearing.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman was present at one White Earth hearing. There had been, as I re-call, 9 or 10 after I went upon the committee, and I had attended every meeting of the committee during that investiga-

Mr. MONDELL. I remember very clearly now, since the gentleman refreshes my memory, that I attended a lengthy hearing in regard to the White Earth matter, at which Mr. Burch was present and at which a number of Indian children testified, including one or two Indian girls.

The letters referred to are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912.

Hon. Frank Mondell.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MONDELL: The subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, for the purpose of taking testimony in the White Earth Indian Reservation matter, of which subcommittee you are a member, will begin its sessions on next Tuesday, January 23, 1912, at the court room in the Federal Building in Minneapolis, Minn., at 10 o'clock a. m. Please be on hand.

Very truly, yours,

James M. Graham. Chairman Subcommittee.

House of Representatives,

Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department,

Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912.

JAMES M. GRAHAM,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures,
Interior Department, Washington, D. C.

Interior Department to acknowledge
Those the honor to acknowledge

Interior Department, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Graham: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 18, in which you state that I am a member of the subcommittee to take testimony in the White Earth Indian Reservation matter; this being the first Indication that I have had that you had selected me as a member of the subcommittee. I note that you also state that the subcommittee will begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 23, 1912, at the court room in the Federal Building in Minneapolls, Minn., and request that I be on hand.

You will recall that when the resolution authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, or subcommittees thereof, to hold sessions outside of Washington during the sitting of Congress and at other times, I offered an amendment, which, if adopted, would have left the committee without authority to sit outside of Washington during the sessions of Congress. I stated, in support of my amendment, that it seemed to me unwise to authorize prolonged absence of Members of Congress from Washington during the sessions of Congress, unless there was some particularly urgent important public business which demanded it, and I expressed the opinion that the investigation which was proposed was not of such an urgent or important character; that as a matter of fact no public interest could be served by such an investigation in the field which could not be equally as well or better served by investigations and inquiries here in Washington.

I further stated that, so far as I was personally concerned, I could not spare the time for such prolonged absence from Washington as was contemplated without neglect of my public duties as a Member of the House of Representatives and of the service which I owed my constituents.

House of Representatives and of the service which I owed my constituents.

At a meeting of our committee, held last Monday, I reiterated my position and stated at length the reasons why I could not leave Washington for the length of time contemplated without neglecting my duties here; that as the only Member from the State which I have the honor to represent it is peculiarly incumbent upon me to be at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress.

I further suggested that Mr. Burke, of the committee, was more familiar with the legislation, the effect of which it was proposed to investigate, than I, he having been for many years a member and quite recently chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. That Mr. Hanna, of the committee, as a resident of the adjoining State, was in all probability more familiar with affairs on the White Earth Reservation than I, and that therefore either of these gentlemen was quite as well or perhaps better qualified than I for the service proposed.

In view of these facts I had hoped you would see your way clear to appoint one of the other Members of the minority on this subcommittee; and to be entirely frank, I was much surprised to find that you had selected me for the place. I very sincerely regret that I do not find myself justified in accepting the appointment. After careful consideration of the matter from all standpoints I am more strongly convinced than ever that I would not be doing my duty as a Representative of the people of Wyoming and a Member of the House were I to accept the appointment. the appointment.

Very respectfully,

House of Representatives, Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, Washington, January 19, 1912.

Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department,

Washington, January 19, 1012.

Hon. F. W. Mondell,

House of Representatives, Local.

My Dear Mr. Mondell: Yours of the 18th instant is just received. I am surprised at the statement in it that my letter of January 18 to you is the first indication you had that I had selected you as a member of the subcommittee, as you were present at the committee meeting on Monday, the 15th instant, when I stated that I would name Mr. George, you, and myself as the members of the subcommittee, giving as my reason that you were the ranking minority member, and it was admitted by the members of the committee that that order was generally followed in the naming of subcommittees.

It is true, as you state, you opposed the resolution authorizing the appointment of a subcommittee; but as the resolution was adopted and the House thus indorsed our effort to carry on the investigation at the least expense by going to Minnesota instead of bringing a very large number of witnesses to Washington, it becomes necessary to comply with the action of the House and send a subcommittee there.

As it is quite probable that we will send other committees to other parts of the country later on under the House resolution, the other minority members will be called on to serve in their turn, so that all will in the end be treated alike.

I do not blame you for not wishing to go. In that respect I think every member of the committee feels as you do. I would be greatly pleased if I did not have to go to Minnesota at this season of the year, and I am sure Mr. George would be, too, but it seems to me it is our duty to go, however much we dislike it.

In any event it is now too late to change the arrangement. I hope you will see your way to join the other members of the subcommittee at Minnesolis next week.

Yery truly, yours,

JAMES M. GRAHAM,

Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

JAMES M. GRAHAM, Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] if I can have five minutes. I will not ask for an extension.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I suppose I will have to yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope he will get five minutes in which to answer my question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAHAM. I agree with my colleague from South Dakota [Mr. Burke] that many of those matters are not worth discussing. He said yesterday it was proposed that the chairmen of the committees would make their own selection. He states now, as I recall it, that I refused to do it. I did not decide that question at that time. I declined at that time to decide it, and I made clear that I would take time to consider it, and I said yesterday the question never came up again, which was true. Just now my colleague on the committee from South Dakota refreshes the recollection of my colleague from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] and said to him there were 9 or 10 meetings of the committee on the White Earth matter before going to Minnesota.

Minnesota.

Now, in these matters of recollection we are all liable to be a little wrong. My friend from South Dakota [Mr. Burke] is cally about two-thirds right in that statement. There were six only about two-thirds right in that statement. There were six hearings of the committee on the White Earth matter prior to going away, and the seventh session was really not a session because it was simply the receipt of a statement by Judge Burch, of the Judiciary Department, which was printed as "No. 7," as the gentleman will clearly recall, showing that prior to it there were six hearings, and only six, in which testimony was taken. We are all liable to be wrong on matters of recollection.

But I am not going to dwell on that. Mr. Chairman, is not this a most singular condition? These matters seem to be trifling. To anyone not on the inside they would be very much tempted to inquire what all this row was about. Is it a tempest in a teapot, gentlemen, you whose corns are being hurt? Why are you making so much fuss about this matter? Is the investigation liable to get somewhere in the near future? Are things to be developed which you will not like? Let me say to you, the investigation will go on just the same. [Applause on the Democratic side.1 You can not defeat the purpose of the committee to go on and find out what facts they can, and if those facts interfere with you, if they hurt you, if they make you squirm, you will have to bear with them and do the squirming. We will not try to get any information that is not correct, but we do not care where it comes from or who brings it to us; if after investigation the committee believes it ought to be followed they will follow it wherever it leads, and they will let this House and the country know what that information is

And I say to my colleagues on this side of the House that what has occurred here yesterday and to-day is the best proof in the world that this committee is doing some good and is likely to do more good.

I yield back the balance of my time. Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the incident is closed now. Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, in order to allow the gentleman from Wyoming to answer the question which was asked him before he took his seat, I will yield to him three minutes' additional time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asked what I knew as a member of the committee as to the employment of Mrs. Helen Grey. I know nothing in regard to it. Mrs. Helen Grey has been present at most of the meetings of the committee that I have attended from the beginning. Mrs. Grey has told me that she was employed by the committee, but I have been unable to secure from the majority of the committee any information whatever on that subject. We are entirely in the dark as to the relations Mrs. Grey sustains toward the committee, except that at times she has interrogated witnesses. Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt at that point? I challenge the gentleman to produce any record where Mrs. Grey has interrogated any witness.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is barely possible that the gentleman from Illinois is technically accurate.

Mr. GRAHAM. Absolutely accurate. Mr. MONDELL. Mrs. Grey, if she has not actually asked questions, has injected remarks into the record, and she has suggested questions on a number of occasions.

Mr. GRAHAM. I also challenge the gentleman to produce

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MANN. Still we do not know who pays her.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I very much regret the absence of the larger part of the membership of this House on the occasion of the session last night, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSTOON] made his address on the subject of the parcel post, or the transport of the small shipments. Had the House heard the first half of his address, that much time in the way of attention would have been rendered unnecessary on your part this afternoon. As it is, I shall feel it necessary to go over some of the portions of the subject as treated by him, in a much less philosophical and interesting way, but still suggestively as necessary to an understanding of my views on this subject.

What is the problem before Congress? Stated briefly, it is this: The economical transportation of the small shipment. That is the problem involved in the parcel-post question. That is the problem, too, involved in the express question. That, also, I think you will find, is the identical problem in the highcost-of-living question, especially with reference to the vital necessaries of life.

Now, what do we mean by the small shipment? We mean, generally, the shipment which falls below the minimum weight limit fixed by the railways in fixing their rates. We mean the unit of 100 pounds, which the railways have universally established as the minimum weight at which they will regard a shipment. But, in a more concrete sense, we mean the retail ship-ment—the shipment in sizes to suit—the ultimate unit of pur-chase; the shipment in forms adapted to the needs of the consumer—the ultimate purchaser.

How serious the condition is in this matter of the transportation of the small shipment I shall take only a moment to suggest. The Agricultural Department reports that farm products, produced in retail form mainly, for which the farmer received some $6,000,000,000, cost the consumers of the United States some

Last year's agricultural products were worth $9,000,000,000 to the farmers. The Government used farm values in getting figures for this total. Assuming that the farmers kept one-third of the products for their own use, the consumers paid more than $13,000,000,000 for what the producers received $6,000,000,000.

The cost of getting the year's products from producers to consumers amounted to the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000.

The real problem to deal with is not high cost of living. It is high cost of selling. (B. F. Yoakum, chairman St. Louis & San Francisco R. R.)

The report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1910 gives the following as the percentages of the prices paid by the consumer which the farmer received for the foodstuffs named:

	Per oultry ggs, by the dozen dery, by the bunch trawberries, by quart ranges, by dozen elons, by pound ototoos by husbal otatoes, by bushel atermelons, singly urkevs abbage, by the head pples, by bushel pples, by barrel nions, by peck reen peas, by quart arsnips, by bunch urnips, by bunch armps, by buildings and a second

Now, the reason that great disparity of price exists appears to be this: There does not exist in the United States to-day any system of transportation that acts as a direct conduit from the farm to the kitchen.

The result is that the eggs, the butter, the chickens, the ham, and the 50 other things that you think of as necessary on the table, although produced in retail forms, ready for the consumer's daily or weekly demands, wanting this conduit from the farm to the kitchen, take the roundabout processes of commerce, fall into the hands of a buying collector, who converts them into wholesale lots, who hands them over to the wholesale trade, which in turn hands them over in wholesale units to the retail trade, when the retail trade reconverts them into retail forms and turns them over to the consumer at a price usually double.

Nevertheless, the transportation does take place; otherwise the article could not move from the farm at all. But it takes place in a broken fashion. The conduit is broken into three or four pieces, and at the end of each piece a commercial process takes place which at length doubles the final price.

Again, I say, our problem is the economical transportation of the small shipment, which involves the parcel post, which involves our express conditions, and which involves, too, the high cost of living.

When we think of transportation, we naturally think of the railways of our country. Let me make this suggestion to the It may not have occurred to them. I am frank to say it had not occurred to me in many years of reading on the subject until after special investigation of this subject. rallways of our country are engaged in a wholesale business, not in a retail business at all. The minimum shipment that they will regard in the matter of rates is 100 pounds. They decline to regard it as less, and even in those instances where the rate on 100 pounds may be less than a quarter, they charge the minimum of a quarter, and in those other instances where you take 20 or 30 pounds to the depot they will charge you for 100 pounds.

It is very rare, if indeed it ever happens, that this ultimate unit of purchase goes to a freight depot. His needs are not such as to call for a 100-pound package. He certainly does not require 100 pounds of beans, or eggs, or butter, and so forth. He must have his supplies in retail form, and the railway, engaged in the wholesale business, fails to handle it in such retail forms.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, in the general scheme of transportation, what objection would there be to the railway company doing this wholesale freight business with its freight trains, and doing what the gentleman from Maryland calls a retail freight business on its passenger trains, as it now does the express business—the railroad company doing the business itself, without the intervention of the express company? What objection would there be to that?

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman will indulge me until I reach that subject in the orderly progress of my remarks, I will thank

Now, we say the railway is drawing an arbitrary line with its 100-pound minimum, is acting unreasonably in exacting a minimum price of 25 cents, whatever the service; but when you come to examine railway practices you find that there are 22 own most of the stock of the express companies?

acts that the railway must perform with regard to a shipment, small or great, journey long or short. On the larger shipments—these 22 acts being mainly acts of accounting attention—the larger shipment can bear them without ill consequence to itself. But on the smaller shipments, this retail shipment, the collective effect and burden of this transportation accounting is such as to penalize it out of the transportation of the railways of the country. Let me say at this point, gentlemen, that one of the most interesting features of the whole subject is the circumstance that of the 22 acts of transportathis moment replaced by the railway to a shipment 15 are at this moment replaced by the postage stamp in the carriage of the small shipment by our postal system. I am convinced that the railway will not be able to handle this small shipment on terms sufficiently economical.

We think of the express company in connection with the small shipment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, will the gentleman yield? If the express company can carry the package, why not the railway company, which in fact does carry the package?

Mr. LEWIS. I can understand the gentleman's impatience, but he will find I can tell him what I know on this subject in a much clearer way if he exercises even further patience. [Applause. 1

Now, there are two troubles with the express company in handling this small shipment. First, mutatis mutandis, it carries the same system of transportation practices that the railway does, and goes through with regard to the small shipment, journey long or short, weight light or heavy, the same acts of attention that the railway does—some 22 acts, 15 of which are replaced by the postal system to-day in handling the package through the postage stamp.

But there is another difficulty in the express company relations to this subject, and a difficulty that requires some patience to understand.

The express company is not a normal transportation agency. It is a parasite—and I use that expression not as an epithet, but as a term of description. In none of its relations to this subject can you deal with it on a priori reasoning, because the facts are so peculiar and so unusual that your reasoning will fail. For example, now, let us put an express rate maker at work making a rate. He is making a rate from here to Baltimore for a 5-pound package. He puts down, let us say, 6 cents to pay overhead charges, all of which might be eliminated by postal administration. He puts down 5 cents to pay the cost of collection and delivery, a sound and useful item, of course. He puts down also 2 cents as the profit for the express company. Here are 13 cents on the express side. But the railway has not yet been paid. How shall it be paid? According to some service standard? Not at all, but according to the contract between the express company and the railway, which on an average provides that the railway shall receive 47½ per cent of the rates finally imposed and paid by the shipper. Thus the express rate maker must add 12 cents to the 13 cents for railway pay on the 5-pound package, making a charge of a quarter of a dollar. This 12 cents amounts to $1.42 a ton-mile, while at the same time, on the same car, receiving the same attention from the railway and express companies, there is the 100-pound express package moving and paying the railway only 14 cents a ton-mile, or one-tenth of the railway charge imposed on the 5-pound package.

If it were not for this contract between the railway and the express company, compelling a contractual rate making instead of natural rate making, the package would have to bear less than 2 cents, its natural share, for railway pay, and the charge would be 15 cents instead of a quarter.

Now, take the other horn. The same rate maker is making a rate on the 100-pound shipment from New York to San Francisco. Obviously in that case the important thing is to pay the railway for its service, which is nearly the whole service, and he puts down $6.41 as the pay of the railway. But the railway can not get this $6.41 unless $7.00 is added to it as the share of the express company, because the railway only gets 47½ per cent of the final rate imposed, and you have the situation of the express company getting, on coast-to-coast rates, about $7 a hundred pounds as its share, about 10 times the value of its service.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Mr. BERGER. Is it not a fact that the railway companies

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather not go into that matter at this time, as I have matters more essential to the discussion,

Mr. BERGER. It would be valuable to know it at this time. Mr. LEWIS. I do not think they do, but I am not thoroughly informed about that.

Mr. BERGER. Well, they do. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman know where we can find the contracts, or see the contracts, that are made between the express companies and the railroads?

Mr. LEWIS. They are on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission; they are summarized in a report by it, which is

We know the feeling exists in this country, and has always existed, that the express rates are extortionate, but feeling is not enough to support prudent legislative action. I have engaged in an investigation to determine to what extent that feeling is sustained. I found this state of affairs: That the average charge of carrying a ton of freight in this country by railway was $1.90; the average charge of carrying a ton of express bundles was $31.20. There was a ratio of about 16½ to 1. I will later file the tables.

Now, you go to other countries, and what do you find? In all other countries that report express statistics, as distinguishable from freight statistics, you find the ratio of express charge to the freight charge as about 5½ to 1, and not 16 to 1, as in this country.

We should expect express charges to be higher per ton here than abroad—as much higher as our freight-per-ton chargesbut no necessary economic cause is known which justifies a substantially higher proportion or ratio of the express to the freight charges here as compared with other countries. The average express charge per ton here is shown to be $31.20, while the express charge per ton here is should be average freight charge is $1.90 per ton, giving a ratio of the express charge to the freight charge of 16 (16.42) to 1. This express charge includes the cost of such collect-and-delivery service as is rendered, covering, it is thought, about 90 per cent of the traffic. In the table now inserted the element of the expense of the express companies for collecting and delivering, amounting to 11.50 per cent, is excluded, because many of the countries do not include this factor of cost. The table embraces 10 countries, while the specific data upon which the ratios are based are set forth in Appendix B. All countries have been included where the express data is clearly distinguishable from general freight statistics.

Excess of American express receipts (216 per cent) ___.

From this table it appears that while Argentina charges three times, Austria five times, Belgium nine times, Denmark six times, France seven times, Germany (including Prussia) five times, Hungary, the Netherlands, and Norway about four times as much for carrying a ton of express as of freight, the express companies of the United States charge nearly fifteen times as much, excluding the cost of their collection and delivery.

No further statement need be made to show that the charges of American express companies are prohibitively excessive and such as to disqualify this service as a transportation agency. The instances given represent matter carried by passenger trains in all instances.

But there is one marked difference between the express service in those countries and our own, and that marked diffrence is the absence of the private express companies.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILITON of Michigan. I have frequently gone to the gentleman from Maryland for information on this question, and I want to ask for a little more. In the investigation of this question has the gentleman been able to ascertain whether these contracts made by the express companies with the railroads involve an exorbitant charge or exorbitant pay to the railroads for performing this function, or is it reasonable?

Mr. LEWIS. I will only say, briefly, no; not in terms, but the effect of the express rate making involves that result. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If the gentleman left off the effect and result"——

Mr. LEWIS. Then the contract provision for railway pay would not be unreasonable. Now we have the ratio of the express charge to the freight—in the United States—16 to 1 as compared to 5½ to 1 in other countries. That our rates are prohibitive, and that the reasoning from the ratios may justly be taken, is found in another circumstance.

For 100 tons of freight in these other countries there is carried a ton of express matter; for 100 tons of freight in the United States there is only one-half a ton of express matter, a circumstance testifying to the natural diminishing effect of a prohibitive rate upon the traffic.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.
Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman elucidate that point a little bit further? Does he mean this, that where the ratio is 16½ to 1, as in this country, as between freight and express charges, it tends to make the load in shipment always larger and to diminish the number of small parcels sent? Is that the

Mr. LEWIS. It tends to destroy the potential traffic. The traffic that you move on a rate of $18 a ton, on the average, will tend to fall to about half on a rate of $36 a ton, whatever the size of the shipment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would it follow that if we had the ratio of 5½ to 1 as between freight and express charges that our shipments would then become in units smaller?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not think that would follow, but the total quantity of the traffic would probably leap up four or five

Mr. ALEXANDER. The express traffic?

It is not exactly the same, but it is Mr. LEWIS. Yes. analogous to the excursion train and excursion rates and their effect upon the passenger traffic, which is an illustration familfar to us all.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that not verified where the rate of passenger traffic is lowered from 3 cents to 2 cents per mile, wherein it shows the amount received by the same railroad on a 2-cent basis is greater than that which was received on a ent basis?

Mr. LEWIS. It involves the same general principle, I may Prudent people would say, If express rates are three times as high as they should be, let us go to the regulator. And here I wish to again call attention to the parasitic character of the express company. Ordinarily, with a normal transportation agency, if rates are too high, if profits especially are greater than they should be, the rate regulator will have a profit margin of the rate sufficiently large upon which to work. For example, on the average, about one dollar out of every three that we pay the railways of this country is profit; so that you can say, in a broad way, that one-third of their rates is profit; and if their rates are extortionate, if their dividends, especially, are too high, the rate regulator has one-third of that rate to play on before he touches the deficit line, which renders the theory of regulation applicable to such a subject. But how about this margin with express companies? Because of the parasitic character of an express company it needs very little capital to engage in a business now swelling up to $170,000,000 a year-only about $10,000,000 of capital, for horses and wagons and safes and equipment. On that $10,000.000 they have been making something over 100 per cent in profits each year; but that 100 per cent of profits on the capital devoted to the express service last year amounted to a margin of less than 7 per cent on the rate, and if the regulator were to approach such a rate to reduce it he would have only a 7 per cent margin to play on for that purpose. He really could not safely play upon it at all, because the reduction might be followed by a perturbation of the traffic that would bring the express company a deficit and not a profit at the end of the year.

If, for example, in further elucidation of that thought, the regulator were to say that the express company was entitled to 10 per cent profit on the capital utilized, that would amount to only one-half of 1 cent of the rate, 50 cents on each $100 Of course prudent men know that business can not be conducted on a margin as small as that, because one could not be certain whether the month's business would bring a profit or a deficit.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have had the pleasure of hearing the gentleman's views upon this question. tion, both in his former speech in the House and in his appearance before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the logic of those facts would not be that if we were to dispense altogether with the parasite, and have the express companies perform this service as they do in foreign countries, we could adjust our rates to a basis of 5½ to 1 instead of 16 to 1, as they do in other countries.

Mr. LEWIS. I will come to that question directly, and I am coming now also to the question propounded by the gentleman from Michigan. Let it be remembered that the express company is a parasite. The railroad, of course, is a normal transportation agency, and one would say that it ought to perform this work.

Now, at this point I first want to suggest that neither the railway nor the express company can articulate with the farm. They can not couple up with the rural delivery structure because they belong to different proprietary controls. The relief required requires this coordination; but I will now come to the point about which the gentleman is evidently thinking. we come to the number of things that the express company and the railroad company have to do in regard to the shipment we find that there were 22. That is true of the express companies when there were 14 of them in number only, and that transportation accounting consumes from two-fifths to twothirds of the express expenses proper. Now, then, there are some 1,100 independent operating railways. If the railways some 1,100 independent operating railways. are compelled to perform this express function you will have then, not 13 express companies but 1,100 express companies, and the condition of "transportation accounting" will be multiplied and the evil aggravated instead of remedied.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. May I ask the gentleman as to how that problem is met in the foreign countries to which the gentleman referred as carrying on an express business at a low rate?

Mr. LEWIS. The problem, sir, I may say, is never presented in foreign countries. There is no foreign country in which they have 1,100 operating railways. Germany and most of the countries of Europe are under a régime of government ownership of railways. In England, where they have private railways, there are very few more operating companies than our express companies; and, as a matter of fact, the situation being so different, they do handle express matter somewhat better in

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. May I ask the gentlemanthat is, if you have half a dozen railway companies doing business across the country and the situation is successful, that the problem loses its force as soon as you get more railway companies to do the business?

Mr. LEWIS. Except as to its small shipments. If I may make the position clear. The problem we have is not the physical movement as much as it is the acts of care and attention necessary, and if you can reduce the carrier status to one caretaker for this diminutive shipment from the consignor to the consignee, you have cut down its multiplied intercorporate relations, and with them all those acts of attention so costly, which have hitherto helped to penalize these small shipments out of business. With regard to the large shipment, I may say to the gentleman from South Dakota that that situation does not exist.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, on that point, will the gentleman answer one inquiry? The expense of accounting for this diminutive package of which the gentleman speaks is the expense incident to the short-haul package.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not understand how that affects the problem, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the small parcel business of this country constitute a large part of the express business-the bulk of it-about 40 per cent? Is not practically the express business the small-parcel business? Is not that, as a rule, the short-haul business, and is not this vision the gentleman builds in regard to the enormous expense that would come from the repetition of accounting met by that very circumstance that the small parcel is usually the short haul?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not think so; and it is against the best railway thought, I will say. I will quote a statement from the president of a large railway on that point in which he does not take that view. The express haul is said to be about 200 miles; the freight haul is 253 miles:

miles; the freight haul is 253 miles:

The probable result of such a change is, perhaps, not overstated in the following extract from the letter of the president of one of our largest railway systems. He says:

"It is gravely to be doubted if the railways, as a rule, could transact the (express) business so as to net as much out of it as the express company pays them.

"Assume that the roads radiating from Chicago should cancel their contracts with the express companies and organize to handle small packages. The first result would be an enormous economic waste in the duplication, triplication, and quadruplication of terminal expenses. At present the collection and delivery for a dozen roads is in the hands of one agency. Multiply this by the hundreds of cities and towns where the same conditions would prevail and it is easy to see that the $11,000,000 of profit the express companies secure might readily fall short of what the railroads would lose should they discard the agency."

The problem is to get the package rate somewhere as diminutive as the package. In order to do this the simplification and not the multiplication of processes and agencies is the great essential. And we have seen also, in the treatment of "transportation accountings," that a small package is now penalized to comparative extinction by the complexity of processes and agencies unavoidable in intercorporate relations and which only a unification of the agencies and simplification of the process can remove.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. While the gentleman is an-

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. While the gentleman is answering the question of the gentleman from South Dakota, what he calls a logical question, I also would like to ask him a question of logic. If the Government should adopt the gentleman's theory and engage in the express business, by either buying up and paying for all the express companies or by building up a comprehensive general express business of its own, would not that logically lead to the ownership of all the railroad companies and all the steamboat companies? Would it not lead logically to that? Can not the gentleman give us an answer to that?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not hope to convince my friend by my answer, though I am thoroughly—

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Since the gentleman has been talking before the committee, he could give some of his time to an answer on this question.

Mr. LEWIS. My time now is limited and is of some value to me. I say that I do not hope to convince the gentleman in regard to that matter, although I am convinced myself that the absence of proper transportation for the small shipment is the strongest argument against the present order of railway man-

No one could have heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] last night without realizing that the strongest argument anyone could have for Government ownership of railroads in this country is the neglect and nonattention on the part of transportation agencies to the small shipment, and if the proper service be not secured in that respect the argument for Government ownership will be very much strengthened.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Evidently in the gentleman's mind the ownership of railroads could naturally and logically, and almost necessarily, follow the other.

Mr. LEWIS. No; except in the way I have suggested. will say to the gentleman that if it is otherwise impossible to secure for these small retail shipments-affecting, as they do, the high cost of living in this country-proper transportation I would be in favor of putting the flag over the railroads in order to accomplish it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I hope the gentleman has understood me, whether I have convinced him or not.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOIL. The gentleman has convinced me as to what his idea is.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman thinks that if a little bit of cake is good you ought to eat a whole barrelful. That is not as logical as the child first thinks. [Laughter.]

Regulation being out of the question, the next thing suggested is the so-called parcel post. What is the purpose of a parcel post? Obviously to bring us some relief from the extortionate express charges. They are getting about three times what they ought to get in this country for the service, and performing only one-half of the service as compared with other countries.

Now, what is that express charge? It is shown to be about $32 for the average ton of packages. The so-called Sulzer bill proposes a rate of 8 cents a pound, or $160 a ton, as a method of relief from a charge of $32 a ton. Of course, this merely means that measures of that sort have received no thought at all. They are simply snow men that the child erects when the snow falls, but which will melt away when the sunshine of knowledge and reason throws its rays upon them.

The next remedial suggestion is one I want to treat in a more extensive way. It is the so-called riders to the appropriation bill before us. The chairman of the committee has said they are not intended as parcel-post bills, and they surely With regard to the rural-route rider, there I believe the committee does make some claims for agreeable reception upon the part of this House. First, I want to suggest to the committee as to these rates on the rural parcel post this circumstance: That all the data obtainable as to the cost of collection and delivery and as to postal railway pay indicate that the rates they have taken for the collection and delivery of parcels on rural routes are high enough, not only to pay for that service, but for a service extending 250 miles on the railway In short, starting with the 5-cent rate for the first pound they might have added only 1 cent a pound for the next 10, and have provided amply for paying the cost of the service. But there is another difficulty with these parcel-post proposi-They are essentially unfair and unjust, unjust because they fail to comprehend the small-shipment problem or meet its real necessities. The problem we have seen is to take the shipment at the point where the railroad leaves it, at 100 pounds and below, and look after it in the interest of all citizens. The parcel-post schemes proposed are 11-pound affairs, just large enough, as it seems to the suspecting merchant, to give his trade to his rival, the distant mail house, by a flat rate; and just small enough to exclude the local merchants from their supposed benefits.

Another difficulty with any parcel-post scheme per se, I suggest, is this: When you come to a longer-journey shipment in this country, nearly the whole rate, the loading for the whole parcel rate, must of necessity consist of the pay to the railways for their service. In 1909, the only year reported, the express companies paid for carrying their matter over the railways, excluding equipment, 7 cents a ton-mile to the railways. The Post Office, in 1908, excluding equipment, paid 13 cents a ton-mile. In short, any parcel put on the postal car, because it is on the postal car, paid nearly twice as much to the railway for transporting it as if it had been put on the express car, because it is the express car. [Applause.]

Mr. LOBECK. That is not very good management, is it?

Mr. LEWIS. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes left.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is not the gentleman going to have more time? I hope he will be given more time.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to have half an hour, if possible. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman 15 minutes

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that here we have a gentleman who does understand these questions, and we would like to hear him fully.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman this time

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] is recognized for 15 minutes more.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, it is very easy to suggest—
Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to state that if the gentleman from Maryland finds he needs additional time, I will yield him 15 minutes. [Ap-

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I want to suggest to the gentleman also that inasmuch as the gentleman from Massachusetts has yielded to me 10 minutes, I will yield some of that time, if the gentleman needs it, in order to ask the gentleman some questions afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman is now extended to 30 minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. But the most serious factor in this subject, after all, is one that I will have to describe with some misgivings, because it consists of a rather intrepid charge upon the natural conceits of the Members of this House.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. - Mr. Chairman, may I now ask the gentleman a question that I intended to ask him before?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask this question: What does the gentleman think of the proposition, as an abstract proposition, of the Government owning its own mail cars and its own express cars?

Mr. LEWIS. In my judgment, unquestionably that ought to be ultimately done.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And the gentleman's idea of the condemnation of express companies' property at the present

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; that ultimate result.

I said I was going to have difficulty with this point, because it attacks the conceits of every man in this House. That proposition simply stated is this: Every parcel-post suggestion that is made here comes in with a schedule of rates attached to it. I wish to say to Members of this House that, even if they are competent Representatives of the people and have that knowledge of general principles that they ought to have in order properly to discharge their duties, they are absolutely incapable of making transportation rates.

I say that the Members of this House, sitting as Members of the House, are as incapable of making rates that would enable the traffic to move as they would be of making astronomical calculations to determine the time of day, and the simple experience of the world over has been just that. Great Britain made the mistake of treating the rates as a legislative matter in relation to her parcel post. She established it in 1883, and Parliament thought that it could get up a schedule of rates, and tacked it on the bill. Nothing ever moved under that schedule of rates; but, fortunately, there was a provision in the bill which enabled the treasury department to reform the rates and regulations, and some years later the treasury department took up the matter as an administrative problem—which it is and now the English parcel-post system is working with relative

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, in that connection, the gentleman does not think, does he, for a moment that we will send any 11-pound packages in this country for $1.32?

Mr. LEWIS. Of course I do not think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not think that any packages of 11 pounds will move?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not think that any packages under the so-called postal rider—above a pound, or possibly 2 pounds will move anywhere under any circumstances, because the express rates are actually lower than the postal rates fixed in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think the express companies will lower their rates if the rates are lowered by the parcel post?

Mr. LEWIS. I have no doubt they will. They have done so up to date.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, suppose we buy out all the express companies or expropriate them. Suppose the Government could get hold of the express business. I should like to have the gentleman from Maryland explain: Would it not be a fact that we would still be in the hands of the railroad companies anyway? Would we not have to make a contract with the railroad companies and be in their hands anyway?

Mr. LEWIS. No.

Mr. BERGER. Kindly explain why not.
Mr. LEWIS. The Government would be one of the parties and the railway company another of the parties in the effort to secure fair railway pay. It is not to be assumed that the Government would wrong the railways, and it is not to be assumed that the wiser heads among the railways would wish to act unjustly in so important a matter. I prefer not to speculate upon those features of the subject just now. We should first meet the express problem and solve it. Just now that is problem enough for me, at least.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has already said that as between the management of this business by the express company and the management of our postal business by the Government, the express company is getting its material hauled at 7 cents per ton-mile, whereas the Government is paying 13 cents per ton-mile at the present time. Does not the gentleman believe that the effect of the Government becoming a parasite, as the gentleman has termed the express company, instead of the express company, if we do not insist on the railroads doing the whole of this business at a proper rate, will be that the people will get no relief from that sort of thing?

Mr. LEWIS, Oh, no. First, the railway company can not perform that business. It has no rural-delivery system by which it can reach the farm. Second, to secure the needed economies for the small shipment you would have to reform the whole list of railway practices, which would take 10 years to introduce into the railway service, even were it at all possible, which I fear it is not. The railways can not adopt the same system of practices that enable the postal system to carry a letter for 700 or 800 miles at an average cost of about one cent and a half apiece. If railway or express practices were applied to a letter, and the same accounting methods were applied to a letter that are aptime is that it is a method of approaching that ultimate result? | plied to a package by the express company and that must be applied to it by a railway, our letter to-day would cost us not 2 cents but nearer to 10 cents apiece.

Which is the cost of a registered letter. Mr. MURDOCK.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, we are all seeking light on this question, I have no doubt, but I am struck with this situation: The gentleman has illustrated and compared the express rates of this country with those of foreign countries, and has shown that our rates are 16 to 1 as against the freight, whereas abroad the express rates are only 51 to 1 as compared with freight.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has already made it clear that abroad they do not have the express companies as a parasite; and when the gentleman has undertaken to show that the express companies could not reduce the rate, he has given us the items that enter into it. Now, I should like to inquire, if we are still to have the Government undertake the function that the express company is now undertaking, and are still to be dependent on the railway company to do the work of hauling, as express companies are dependent on the railway company, would not the Government in that way become a parasite instead of the express company, and could it conduct that branch of the business any cheaper or at lower rates than the express companies conduct it?

Mr. LEWIS. I think perhaps I had better read what the express company has to do with a small package, in order to bring the matter out more clearly.

Mr. FOWLER. From what do you read?

Mr. LEWIS. I am reading from a document on the subject: 1. The railway company employee first unloads the articles from the consignor's vehicles.

2. Loads the articles into the car.

3. Ascertains the rate to be paid. There are 220,000,000,000 express rates, counting all the rates between all the different stations, and one of these in each case is the right rate and all the others are wrong.

4. Makes out bill of lading.

5. Makes out waybill and sends copy to auditor and the train conductor.

6. Sends copy to auditor.

Sends copy to train conductor.

8. Receiving agent, destination, receipts to conductor-9. Sends notice to consignee.

10. Unloads package from car. 11. Takes receipt of consignee. 12. Loads it on consignee's wagon.

- 13. Agent gets money for shipment—

 14. Copies bill of lading into record of freight forwarded. 15. Copies bill of lading into record of freight received.
 16. Sends statement of freight "sent" to auditor.
- 17. Sends statement of freight "received" to auditor.

 18. Auditor checks bill of lading against records of sending agent-
 - 19. Checks bill of lading against record of receiving agent. Advises treasurer of money due by each agent, Makes statistical report from bill of lading.

22. Calculates, per bill of lading, amount payable the different railways.

It is these practices which now penalize the small package, and there is but one agency in this country that can eliminate them. It is the postal system; it is doing so now.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What percentage of the express rate is represented by this elaborate and apparently useless system?

Mr. LEWIS. So far as one can say, about two-fifths or two-thirds of the express expense proper.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Early in the gentleman's remarks the gentleman stated that 471 per cent of the express rate is paid to the railway company.

Yes. Mr. LEWIS.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course that has nothing to do with this question?

Mr. LEWIS. No. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then the gentleman gave

2 per cent as the profit of the express company?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Two cents in that particular rate. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And 7 per cent for some other item. What percentage was the accounting which the gentleman now refers to?

Mr. LEWIS. Of the 13 cents in the particular case referred to the accounting would consume at least 6 cents, and probably

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Which the gentleman thinks, if the Government performs that function, would be eliminated?

Mr. LEWIS. Utterly eliminated. It is now eliminated with reference to the small shipment when it is put in its hands.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he started on a proposition a few moments but did not finish it, that Members of Congress were not able to make rates. Who can make the rates?

Mr. LEWIS. That is a most interesting feature of the discussion. What is the object of a rate? The object of a transportation rate is to move the package to its natural market with a profit to the producer, for if it be not moved at a profit to the producer the production will cease. That is the first The second object is to produce enough revenue to pay the cost of the service, plus that profit to the capital employed necessary to insure adequate capital.

But, unfortunately, all subjects of transportation can not bear the same rate. You can not simply ascertain the average cost of carrying a ton of freight in the United States for a certain distance and then apply that rate to freight traffic of the coun-If you did you probably would destroy one-half of the coal traffic and one-half of the grain traffic.

Look into a freight car when you are passing and you will find half a dozen shipments there, say 100 pounds each, all going from the same point to the same point, one paying 6 cents, another 12 cents, another 15 cents, and all the way up to 30 cents, apparently receiving the same sort of attention and service from the railway.

Why a discrimination like that? It is a discrimination necessary to move the maximum of traffic, for if you were to fix a merely average rate everything in the car moving now at a rate below it would fail to move. In other words, disagreeable as the statement may be to our first impulse, there is no such thing as a scientific rate; there is no such thing as a service Transportation rates are taxes-possess the incidence and ethics of taxation-for in order to move the traffic you must adjust the burden of the rate to the capacity of the article to bear it and move.

If you subjected all shipments to the same rate, it would be much the same as ascertaining an average size and weight of each human being and having all their suits of clothing made in the same way. You would have a suit of clothes that did not fit a single human being. [Laughter.]

Now, we want to have rate makers whose business it is to stay with the rate to see it work out, not men who make a rate to-day, as we might make it in Congress, and go home and forget all about it and perhaps not be returned to remember it again; and I think that is what will happen to most of us if we go into parcel-post rate making, as now proposed. You know the people of the country, who have not had time to investigate, who are not $7,500 men as we are, many of them think that a parcel post is like a Corliss engine or an Ingersoll watch—something sui generis, something definite, that you can order $1 or $1,000, and get what you expect.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And have it go after you get it.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; but a parcel-post watch would not move. In order to do that you want to have a working rate and a rate-making tribunal. Congress realized that when it had the bill before it regulating railway rates. Dld it pretend to make freight rates for the railways of the country? Certainly not; it turned the rate making over to the Interstate Commerce Commission as its function, to work on from day to day, Now, a mistake in rate making may be made in two ways: The rate may be made so low as to wreck the Treasury, or the rate may be so high as to prevent traffic. You need the nicest adjustments in practical rate making, and a rate maker who can apply himself from day to day in order to bring the fiscal and mobility circumstances of the rates into sufficient reciprocal operation is necessary to produce the desired result. The proposition of the Goeke bill, taking over the express companies, is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make these rates upon tentative proposals of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the proposition of the gentleman is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make these rates from time to time upon the suggestions of the Postmaster General. Is that the idea?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. Now, I come to my friend from South Dakota. He wanted to know in what way the rates are to be reduced. We can eliminate the transportation account and that saves so much.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. How are you going to eliminate the transportation account?

Mr. LEWIS. By substituting the postage stamp.
Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has stated that they are now getting the hauling done at half of what the Government gets it for.

Mr. LEWIS. The proposition is to take over the express contracts and secure this relatively low rate of railway pay.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. But if we take over the express contracts we will have to pay $47\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. LEWIS. No; that does not follow. I am not blaming the gentleman for his suggestion; but that does not follow. I am not blaming That is a remediable condition.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Subject to explanation?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; this question raises a subject for explanation. When you come to rate making, where you have a monopoly in transportation matters, the amount of traffic you can move depends largely upon the rate you make. In the case of the small shipment we need the public motive. Let me illustrate: You go to an express company and you say, "Last year you moved 5,000,000 tons of parcels, and if you cut your rates in two this year you will move 10,000,000 tons; you will double the traffic." The express company, acting upon the private motive, which is perfectly justifiable in that case, would say, "How about the profit?" You would reply, "Well, your profits will not be any more than they were last year, and maybe a little less, but, then, they ought to be a little less, on the whole."

What will the express company do? It will do what the rest of us would do-act on the private motive, reject the increased traffic, the double public service, and retain the profits to which it has been accustomed. However, you go to the postal organization of this country, that is acting upon public motives, and make the same proposal. You find there that a public functionary, acting under a public motive, would say, "If I can double the public service by cutting this rate in two, I will take the chances on the profits. If I lose 1 per cent in this pocket as a profit, I will gain 100 per cent in the other as public, since the people and the postal system are identical terms. private agent might not be approached with that argument. We have no such claim upon it, but when you have to have a monopoly, where the character of the motive determines how much traffic you are going to have, you have a situation like that of the English railway some 60 years ago. It was just beginning and there were no formulas by which it could determine what passenger rates to charge. It wanted to know how high to make the passenger rate to secure the best dividends, the natural human motive; and very much as a man in an opera house adjusts his pair of glasses to get the line of closest vision, its rate makers started with rates at 3 pence a mile and went down to rates as low as a half penny a mile. They found that as the rate was a cent a mile or 6 cents a mile the difference in the profits did not amount to 2 per cent, but that the rate at 3 cents a mile happened to produce them about 5 per cent, when the others produced about 4 per cent. So they rejected the rate that would have given three times the public service in favor of a rate that gave them the desired larger dividend, as private investors.

We now come to rate making for the purpose of moving the maximum of desirable traffic in these articles. Ought all articles to pay the same rate? Of course, if we are going to make the rate, they will all pay the same, or, rather, perhaps they will not travel—will not pay—at all, because our rates—flat rates—will not be adapted to move them under any circumstances; but since the economy of transportation requires the fullest load, you can secure the lowest rates; or, in other words, since a full wagon enables you to carry the cheapest traffic, you want rates that will fill that wagon, and you may find it necessary that the rates should be such as will fill that wagon—rates which might be higher on butter and eggs than on potatoes or apples.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

SHERLEY. Does the gentleman carry his idea not only to a different rate for commodities, but to a different rate for localities in order to bring about the competition that the railroads have found necessary in their zones on rate making?

Mr. LEWIS. No, I do not, if I understand the gentleman's question. I believe that under our institutional system we should give local equality, and that that would carry like rates for like localities.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman takes the position of equality as to locality, does he not then bring himself up against the same sort of objections that he is urging against equality as to commodity?

Mr. LEWIS. In a measure, yes; but I think in only a negligible way. Of course, you want to have the same rates for rural routes all over the country, although some rural routes may have very good roads, may be short, and other rural routes may be muddy and mountainous. We would not, under our in-stitutions, want to have the rates differentiated to the conditions of the different rural routes.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, if the gentleman will permit, it is possible to move wheat from the far West to the East only by making a certain rate for the long haul, and the competitive zone that that wheat can go into is determined by the rate that is fixed, as the gentleman well understands.

Now, express charges are no different from railroad charges, except we call one freight and the other express and one is supposed to be quicker than the other. If it has been necessary in order to move the freight in railroad rates to have this zone arrangement, why is it not equally necessary when you get to the movement of express matter?

Mr. LEWIS. There may be instances where the commodity rates referred to by the gentleman would be necessary. Now, I have but a few minutes more, and I have already claimed the patience of the committee long enough. I have two other points

I wish to bring briefly to your attention, and then I will close.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Before the gentleman leaves that point, I would like to ask him one question. What is the position of the gentleman on the question of the flat rate discussed last night by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPON]?

Mr. LEWIS. I have already declared that the freight rate would not move the traffic, and I do not wish to enter into a would not move the traffic, and I do not wish to enter into a controversy about the flat rate. I do not favor it—

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I have not had the pleasure of listening to the gentleman; I regret it, and I am listening now. It may be that he has discussed it; if so, I will ask him to discuss it again. Now, the pound package or the I0-pound package may be of a value of $1,000 or $10,000, or may be of the value of 50 cents. Do I understand the gentleman is in favor of taking over the express service? over the express service?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir. It belongs of right to the postal system.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman would leave it to some commission to be created to take all these questions into con-

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir. The Postmaster General should initiate regulations and rates, subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the plan of the Goeke bill now under consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I will say.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman contemplate, in the event the express companies are taken over, to place a limit on the weight or does he intend to carry without limit as express companies do now carry?

Mr. LEWIS. A limit of 100 pounds is now proposed, giving one year to the railways to get ready to handle the larger shipments.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman believe, if the bill should go into operation—and I have not had the pleasure of reading it, but I will if it has been introduced; I am not very industrious; I have so much to do—or has the gentleman considered the question as to whether if you limit it to 100 pounds and have that adjusted, the limit would not increase to 1,000 pounds, and whether if that step is taken it does not lead inside of a decade to Government ownership?

Mr. LEWIS. I must decline to again go into the speculative question presented by the gentleman. I have discussed it, and there are other important features that I desire to present.

Now, there are two objective points—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes additional to the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the gentleman. And those two objective points are these. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] very clearly brought out last night, the transportation of the small shipment has been the subject of most utter and ruinous neglect in this country. Especially is that so in reference to its unorganized transportation from the farm to the town and the city. Let me suggest to the House the picture of a condition which occurs to my mind under a reorganized system of transportation, a coordination of the rural delivery structure with the express plant and the railways. I see a coal miner, 60 years of age, unable longer to breathe the vitiated air of the mine, and yet an athlete in spirit and in strength. To-day he can not go into small suburban gardening. Why? Because, in addition to buying the 2 or 3 acres of land and the cottage necessary to protect himself and his wife, he would have to buy a complete transportation system in order to get the few small by-products of his garden from his place to the town and the city, and he would have all that transportation system to maintain-the horse, the barn, the wagon-throughout the entire year, when, perhaps, for but a week or two would be need them to perform service. This condition is now prohibitive to him. Connect the rural delivery structure with the express plants and the railways and you have a postal van before his place every day, every other day, twice a week, or once a week, and his transportation needs would be attended to with the utmost economy to the country and convenience to him. A new line of industry would open up for the discarded workman of the city, who at 50 or 60 years is now thrown on the scrap heap for some younger man.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Has the gentleman thought out, for instance, how the small farmer or gardener, who is sending his products in small packages by the Government postal agent to the city and selling it there will collect the pay for those parcels?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I will say the postal-express regulations will provide for collecting the price of the articles when sent to the consumer C. O. D., just as the express company now In taking over these express plants you would adopt all those practices that are good and useful. You would eliminate the wasteful processes only, but retain the really valuable points in the structures of existing express plants.

Now, then, another suggestion in that connection. But a few months ago a half dozen articles, table necessaries, sold at a farm in Montgomery County at $2.85, the price the farmer received. They were produced in retail form and could have gone direct to the consumer, but a single transportation conduit, coupling up the transportation agencies that now exist being absent, they could get direct from the farmer to the consumer, and so it had to go by the roundabout process of commerce, and cost the consumer $5.55. I insert a table giving the facts.

RELIEVING THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

As the President has stated, the high cost of living is unquestionably bound up in this legislation. The vital necessaries are not too high at the farm, nor yet when the mere cost of transportation is added. But our processes of transportation, where they exist, exclude the consumer from direct contact with the farmer; they are 100 pounds and 20 tons processes, not practical for the consumer. The individual farmer is helpless to correct the uneconomic rural transportation. The individual railway or express company is equally helpless to correct theirs. The people's transportation system, so far as allowed, can correct the deficiencies of both, and only awaits the license of Congress to perform its function, enable the railway to carry the shipments in quantities to suit the consumers' needs, and provide a direct conduit through which may flow the vital necessaries on the farms direct to the mouths that eat them in the towns and cities.

The following table, giving the prices of six of the prime, vital necessaries, as sold by the farmer, by the wholesaler, and the prices finally paid by the consumers, is based on the quotations of the Washington market for a single day. The third and eighth columns give the prices paid that day by the consumers, and the seventh, ninth, and tenth columns the prices to the consumers under a system of transportation such as is here urged, carrying the article directly from the farmer to the consumer in the quantities set forth as "units of ship-ment"; that is, in quantities to suit the needs of an average

Note.—The last three columns represent the price of the shipment with the estimated cost of transportation added to the price at which the article sold in the country, as stated in the fourth column above.

It appears that the cost of these indispensable necessaries may be reduced about two-fifths, or from $5.55 to $3.24, in price to the consumer by the simple expedient of a direct from-farmer-to-consumer method of transportation. In instances where the farmer and consumer were unknown to each other a small charge of from 3 to 5 cents would have to be added to pay the cost of collecting the price and remitting it to the But where established custom obtained even this charge would not be necessary, as periodic settlements would take the place of the C. O. D. practice. A line in the local paper would inform the consumer as to prices and the producer; and a postal card or a phone call would inform the producer of the consumer's wants. The postal transportation conduit would then pass the articles from producer to consumer and collect and remit the farmer the price, if required. The latter would not, as an intelligent constituent writes me, have to leave his farm to market a small allotment, when, as he explains:

It sometimes happens that on the day that I must go to market a field is in ideal condition to be prepared for planting a crop, or to cultivate a growing crop, or a field of hay or grain is ready to be put in the mow; but I must go to town to dispose of my produce.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman in favor of sending perishable property by parcel post? If he is, does he think the Government ought to be responsible for any property that is destroyed as the result of its failure to make delivery promptly?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; the Government ought to perform all the obligations that are now imposed on the express company, supplemented by insurance which would quickly indemnify losses in such cases,

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Upon that subject I would like to ask the gentleman this: I supposed that considerable of what the gentleman has called the accounting of the express companies was for keeping close track of packages in order to enable the company to answer to damages in case of loss. But I understand the gentleman to say now that he would have the Government guarantee the safe carriage of all packages under his system?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And if a thousand-dollar package was lost the Government would have to be responsible. Mr. LEWIS. For special cases like that it would have to make special provisions. It has now special provisions for these valuable packages. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think the Government could keep any cheaper account of this valuable class of business than the express companies keep in their own interests?

Mr. LEWIS. They are doing it now. There should be proper discrimination. There is practically no discrimination now in the express companies. Besides there is a marked difference of spirit between the postal system and express companies, I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota. The express company seems to adopt the presumption, which, I think, is unjustified, that every one of its employees might be a thief. Its whole accounting system and practices are based on that fear.

It pays this accounting bill partly in order to prevent thievery. The Government, on the other hand, in the postal system says, rather than penalize every package to prevent an occasional theft, I will take chances on an occasional theft and find out and punish the thief later. The Government has the most economical and wisest policy.

Mr. MADDEN. What becomes of the law? The Government does not hold itself responsible for the loss created.

Mr. LEWIS. That is only a provisional matter. It can and will do so. If the express business is taken over under the Goeke bill, it will do so. In all cases where other governments have undertaken this service they not only give such assurance as is given by private transportation companies, but add insurance besides, so that early indemnification may follow.

Just another word or two. I thank you for your exceeding indulgence and patience.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I understand that I have been granted 10 minutes, and out of that time I would like to ask the gentleman a question now, if the gentleman has no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. All right. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Of course I know you were here last night and listened to the interesting and able address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]. I want to know if you take the same position that he does—that these parcels should be as large as 100 pounds?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. You take that position? Mr. LEWIS Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Then I would like to ask you, secondly, if this proposed legislation is passed that is in the Post Office appropriation bill now by Congress, do you think the Government would be in a position to take care of a general parcel post by July 1 of this year?

Mr. LEWIS. Are you speaking now of some artificial structure that this House is to erect, without taking over the express

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I am talking of this matter substantially as it is in the Post Office appropriation bill. Suppose Congress should pass it and we adjourn, in 90 days afterwards would the Government then be able to take care of a proposition like that?

Mr. LEWIS. I regret as to matters of that kind I have not given them such thought. I have thought of the express method, the practicable method, more especially.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. One other question: Would you give us any idea of the cost of the parcel post at this time?

Mr. LEWIS. The cost of acquiring the express companies? Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I do not know whether you think we ought to own the express companies or not.

Mr. LEWIS. The express companies would cost us less than thirty millions. I would not be able to go into speculations about the cost of parcel-post structures. They would cost in increased railway pay thirty millions every year-and perhaps much more in expense of unnecessary experimentation-when we might take the worked-out modus operandi of the express companies

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Now, one other question: I did not hear the gentleman when he made his formal speech some time ago. The gentleman has not touched to-day upon the question as to how a general parcel post would, in his judgment, affect the local merchants.

Mr. LEWIS. Just a moment as to that. I think it is a great mistake for anybody to think that anybody is going to suffer by improved transportation—that is, fair transportation; and I think it is even a bigger error for anybody to think that poor transportation or no transportation is an advantage to him.

[Applause.]

The trouble with your parcel-post schemes, as proposed, has been that they are unfair on their face to the local merchants. The flat rate, giving his distant rival, the mall-order house, unnaturally but equal rates, particularly, is not fair, while the limitation of the privilege of shipment to 11 pounds seems to be designed to be just big enough to take his patron away from him, but too small to give the merchant the supposed advantages of this Government service.

We ought to be fair. We ought to give our constituents and the country that treatment which the rule of the court gives equality of treatment-and we ought to take up the shipment where the railroad leaves it, 100 pounds and less, and face the actual problem itself, in the interest of all classes of our citizens, merchants as well as others.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I thank the gentleman from Maryland, and I now yield back to the gentleman from Massa-chusetts [Mr. Weeks] such time as I have not consumed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the Goeke bill express the gentleman's ideas in a general way?

Mr. LEWIS. Fully.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I suppose the gentleman thinks it might be changed in some way, but the general purposes express what the gentleman wishes to accomplish?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir; it does.

Now, I owe to the Members of the House a sincere apology for the time I have taken. But this is not a little subject. It is a most important subject. In my judgment it is charged with matter of the gravest national moment to our country. we have reached a condition where workmen, working at full time and at full pay on wages larger, perhaps, than they have ever received before, and are yet unable to make both ends meet because of the high cost of living, I say you are fronting a situation that may be charged with peril to this country. [Applause,]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. LEWIS. Just a sentence more, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five

I am not one of those who think that any one Mr. LEWIS. line of treatment or any one remedy is going to cure even all the remediable ills of society. I do not say that this, even if carried out in its most perfect conception, would cure all the ills of society, or even cure the whole aggravated situation associated with the high cost of living. But I do say this, gentlemen, that the Goeke bill comes closer to cutting in two the prices of the vital necessaries of life on the workman's table than any measure that has yet come to my notice.

It has been said that never in the history of this country has a great crisis arisen when American statesmanship and patriotism were not there to meet it in an adequate way. I pray God that before the stability of this country has been put in jeopardy, as now threatents within 10 years, that statesmanship and that patriotic spirit may not fail us on this subject. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon].

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries an appropriation aggregating over $264,000,000. In addition to this there are a number of subjects which we have dealt with. By the provisions of this bill we seek to establish a parcel post. We have reduced the cost for transportation of fourth-class mail matter from 16 cents to 12 cents per pound and have increased the number of pounds of this class mail matter from 4 to 11 pounds, and thereby place the American citizen on an equal footing with the foreigner in the matter of transportation of fourth-class mail matter. We have provided that on and after July, following the passage of this bill, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in the first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours per day, and that the service shall not extend over a longer period than 10 consecutive hours, and the schedule of duty of the employees to be regulated accordingly. We have provided for the grading and classification of railway postal clerks-a much needed reform. The committee has also provided by this bill for an increase in the salary of the rural carrier. Section 10 of the bill deals with the question of the establishment of free delivery of mail from towns and villages having post offices of the second and third class, which are not now by law entitled to this service. Section 11 carries an appropriation of $400,000 for the establishment, maintenance, and extension of postal savings depositories within the United States. Your committee has also placed a provision in this bill that, becoming a law, will prevent the President and Postmaster General from attempting to suspend the Constitution of the United States by an Executive order with reference to the right of certain employees who are citizens of the United States from petitioning or memorializing Congress when, in their judgment, they have a grievance that they think should be called to the attention of Congress.

I should like to call the attention of the committee to some of the new provisions incorporated in this bill.

The Post Office Committee has attempted to meet the needs of a great department—and I refer to the Post Office Depart-They have undertaken, I believe, honestly and fairly to meet the needs of this department and at the same time remain within reasonable bounds of economy.

FREE DELIVERY IN SMALL TOWNS.

The provision with reference to free delivery from second and third class post offices is a deeply important matter. Consider the large number of localities that are without free delivery service—localities which are adding largely to the revenues of the Government. They are entitled to relief. It is the purpose of your committee seriously to experiment, in a certain line, with this great subject, and they are not unmindful that it is an undertaking of magnitude; but we have provided that this system shall be inaugurated and have limited the cost for delivery of mail in such towns and villages to $1,800 per annum. It has been left within the discretion of the Postmaster General as to how this provision shall be inaugurated. It may be, and it is likely, that he will determine to begin with two carriers, and should he do so, in most towns and villages having post offices within the designated class, two carriers would no doubt be able to give the much-needed relief to a large class of our citizens who are now entirely without a free-delivery service.

RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

The provision of the bill dealing with the grading and classification of railway mail clerks is a subject which has been much It has been charged, whether correctly so or not I discussed. am not prepared to say, that there has been discrimination against a certain class in the Railway Mail Service. It has been charged from all parts of the country that if a railway mail clerk is in the favor of his superior promotions are granted, and that in many instances it was done without regard to merit or efficiency. Without affirming that injustice has or has not been done with respect to this, it is our purpose to provide that absolute justice shall prevail at all times and that promotions shall be made on merit, to the end that each individual shall be fairly treated and that the service at the same time may be improved.

We have endeavored to meet the conditions, so far as they relate to that vast number of employees engaged in the hazardous business of serving in the Rallway Mail Service. Many railway mail clerks have lost their lives, and it is claimed that in many instances this could have been prevented had the cars in which they were working been constructed of steel or of some other equally indestructible material. We provide that on and after July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall approve no contracts with the railroad companies for carrying the mails unless the equipment is constructed of steel, steel underframes, or other equally indestructible material.

EIGHT HOURS FOR CLERKS AND CARRIERS.

It is the fixed policy of this Government that 8 hours shall constitute a day's work for all Government employees. Congress has provided that those taking Government contracts should not work employees over 8 hours per day. We find upon investigation that clerks in first and second class post offices and city-delivery carriers have been and are required to work many hours in excess of eight hours per day; and where the 8-hour idea has been in force or attempted to be put in force the 8 hours in many instances have been extended over a period from 11 to 12 hours, and in many instances in Therefore your committee has provided that excess of this. after July 1 following the passage of this bill letter carriers in the city delivery and clerks in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours per day and that the service shall not extend through a period longer than 10 consecutive hours. I deem this a most wholesome provision, and when put into operation its ultimate result will eventually improve the service and at the same time do justice to this class of Government employees.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Mr. Chairman, I for one am in favor of maintaining our rural free-delivery system and am in favor of extending it as rapidly as possible. I know of no agency that has worked more good to a large class of our citizens than has the ruraldelivery service. It has been a source of great disappointment to me in not being able so far to secure the establishment of a number of rural routes in my own district, to which I think we are entitled. I do not mean to be selfish about this, as I feel sure a similar condition exists perhaps throughout the country. I am not one who believes that all things can be done in a day, and I realize that in many instances many difficult problems confront the department in the matter of a more rapid extension of this service, and it is and shall be my purpose to aid in every way within my power to facilitate this great work. One of the hindering causes in the early reports on petitions for establishment of rural routes is due perhaps to the inability to secure prompt reports and inspections owing to the large amount of work which the inspectors have had to encounter in the great fraud cases that the department has been dealing with; and in view of this and in order to facilitate the establishment of rural routes the committee has provided that for the purpose of inspecting and investigating rural routes and proposed rural routes a number of inspectors, not in excess of 30, shall be placed, subject to the orders of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General whenever and for such period as in his judgment mey may be needed for such purpose. There are from 1,600 to 2,000 petitions now pending for the establishment of rural routes throughout the United States, and action on these petitions has not been had for the lack of inspection. I confidently believe, with this number of inspectors at the disposal of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, within the next 12 or 18 months that all petitions will be passed upon and the service extended in many instances and to places where this service is now so much needed.

INCREASED SALARY FOR RURAL FREE-DELIVERY CARRIERS.

We have also attempted to improve the efficiency of the rural free-delivery carriers by an increase of the salaries approximating $6 per month for all rural carriers. The inevitable result of this will be, I believe, to increase the efficiency of the service. I want to say to you that there are to-day, in my judgment, no class of Government employees so poorly paid as are our rural carriers in the United States, considering the service they perform. The high cost of living applies to the rural carrier as it applies to all other citizens. His cost of equipment has increased; the price of food, both for himself and his horses, has increased. I do not believe that the many hardships which the rural letter carrier encounters is fully appreciated by the people or by Congress. I have been over a number of rural routes and I have seen something of the conditions which exist with reference to the service performed by rural carriers. He must make his trips under all conditions, and, failing to do so, deductions are made from his salary. It is true that, on application made to the department, through the postmaster, if a showing is made that the reason for his failure to make his route or his schedule was unavoidable, dedeductions made will be refunded to him; but there are instances where the postmaster may not be friendly to him, and his application for a refund may be indefinitely delayed, when he needs the small pittance he receives to pay for feed for his horse, to repair his vehicle, and to support himself and family.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I am glad the gentleman has referred to this question of rural free-delivery carriers. What, in the gentleman's judgment, ought they to receive as a fair compensation?

Mr. BLACKMON. I think they ought to receive, on a standard route, undoubtedly not less than $100 per month.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. In other words, they ought to receive as much as the city carriers. Mr. BLACKMON. I think they ought. I think when you take into consideration the fact that the rural carrier must keep up his equipment, that he must keep two or three horses, whatever the necessity may be, and must keep up his other equipment, undoubtedly he is entitled to the same compensation as the city carrier. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is it not a fact that when this service was started 12 or 14 years ago the salary was only $500 a year?

Mr. BLACKMON. I am not prepared to say, but I think that was very inadequate then, and it is inadequate now.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Has not the Government been pretty liberal in doubling the salary in 10 or 12 years?

Mr. BLACKMON. I shall have to ask the gentleman what he considers liberal?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. They have doubled the

Mr. BLACKMON. But as a matter of fact the Government has not done so.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is it not $1,000 a year now?

Mr. BLACKMON. No; not in all cases. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How much is it?

Mr. BLACKMON. It is less than a thousand dollars in some cases.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. How much less? Mr. BLACKMON. I have not the exact figures before me. Mr. DENT. It is $1,000 on standard routes.

Mr. BLACKMON. A rural carrier gets $83.33 a month for a standard route, but as I say I do not know what the gentleman considers liberal. If it is not worth $100 a month to the Government of the United States to employ a man who carries out a system that is doing more to educate the people of the country than any other influence to-day, I do not think it is very liberal.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I did not mean to say that it was not worth $100 a month, but I meant to suggest that it seems to me that the Government had been fairly liberal in increasing the salary from $500 to practically $1,000 within 12 or 14 years.

Mr. BLACKMON. I imagine that the rural carrier has received that with thanks, but it does not destroy the force of the argument that the compensation is not yet sufficient. Now, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with this question I think every member of the committee on this and all other questions has sought to improve the service.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. Chairman, we have given much thought and study to the subject of a parcel post. The bill now presented on this subject provides that the rate on fourth-class mail matter shall hereafter be 12 cents per pound and the number of pounds which may be sent through the mail increased from 4 pounds to 11 pounds. On rural routes fourth-class mail matter may be sent through the mails at a rate of 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound up to 11 pounds, the packages to originate at the starting or some intermediate point of the route and end with the route. A person living on a route can send to the starting point or to anyone living at an intermediate point on the route or from the starting point of the route at the same rate.

The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. Lewis], who has evidently given great thought and care to this subject, is opposed to this kind of a parcel post. He says that the people do not want a parcel post. If he is correct about that I am very much at a loss to know what the people mean when they write asking us to vote for a parcel post.

Mr. SAMUEL, W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLACKMON. Certainly.
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] to take the position that he was not in favor of a parcel post?

Mr. BACKMON. Yes; he says that he is not in favor of the kind that we have discussed—that it is impracticable. His position is that a parcel post, without taking over the express companies, will be a failure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to put this one proposition to the thoughtful Members of this House-those who say that they are in favor of doing something-and they all admit, as I understand it, that the people are entitled to some relief along these lines. I want to put this proposition to you: Are you in favor of passing this bill as presented to you by the committee or do you prefer to turn this down and wait for a time to come when you shall acquire the express companies and get that ideal situation that some Members seem to think we ought to have?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLACKMON. Certainly.
Mr. MURDOCK. Now, that question would be easier answered if we could understand exactly what this provision in the bill means. The gentleman is on the committee as I am, but I think I see something new about this bill every time I read it, and I have read it scores of times. I want to read from the provision in relation to parcel post, page 35 of the pending bill. This has just been called to my attention, and I want to see what is the gentleman's opinion about it, because I must confess that I was surprised to-day at this reading. The gentleman will note on page 35 the first two sections:

Sec. 8. That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

That no article, package, or parcel shall be mailable as matter of the fourth class which exceeds 11 pounds in weight, except as herein provided.

Now, the exception referred to in one instance is the rate provided for the delivery of packages on rural routes farther down in the same section. This has just been pointed out to me: It is contended by several gentlemen here that if the gentleman from Alabama should attempt to send me a package and I lived on a rural route, say, route No. 2, Wichita, Kans., the gentleman would not be permitted to send me a pound package for 12 cents; that the rate under this provision of 12 cents a pound does not apply on a package shipped from one point off a rural route to a point on a rural route. Did the gentleman understand that was the idea of the provision when we considered it in committee?

Mr. BLACKMON. No; I did not. Mr. MURDOCK. And I want to say that I did not, and yet from the language of the bill as shown in the two exceptions there in the first two paragraphs it seems to be the case, so far as this provision is concerned.

Mr. BLACKMON. I do not agree with the suggestion. I think that if I lived in Anniston, Ala., I could send to the gentleman in Kansas, on a rural route, a 1-pound package for 12

Mr. MURDOCK. That is just the point. You live in Anniston and I live outside Wichita on rural route No. 2. The gentleman could not mail me a pound package for 12 cents.

Mr. BLACKMON. I think so. Mr. MURDOCK. That is the contention that I find gentlemen are making.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. The time on the other side is in my charge, and I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will yield to me, I think can clear that matter up in the two minutes.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman to do it, but in his own time.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not asked for any time. Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman, and he can ask his question.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas MURDOCK] raised the question that under this bill, this provision of the post-office bill, it would be impossible to send a package from rural route No. 2 out of Wichita, Kans., to some point not on rural route No. 2, under the 12-cent rate, but that that kind of a package would have to pay the rate under existing law.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman take the reverse of that, that you can not send from a town to a point on a rural route out of another town a pound package for 12 cents. Does the gentleman so understand the law?

Mr. BORLAND. I so understand the law, but I understand that was put in there intentionally, with the idea of restricting the package to the rural route. I have always contended that the rural-route free-delivery parcel post was an adjunct to the express-company business, and enlarged its business, and did not compete with it, and never was intended to compete with it, and never will compete with it. If the gentleman will look at the bill, H. R. 12810, regulating charges for transportation of parcels by express companies engaged in interstate commerce, reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, he

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the Adamson bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. The first section of that bill provides certain rates that may be charged by express companies based on 2,000 miles, 12 cents a pound; on less than 2,000 miles, 10 cents a pound; on packages not exceeding 11 pounds in weight, and so on down, all of which rates are higher than those companies are now charging. The second section of that bill provides that the express company when tendered a package may charge the consignor the express rate therein named, and also the postage at the special low rate for the rural free-delivery routes, and thus accept a package for delivery upon the rural route which their express company does not reach. When the package gets to the nearest express town, then the company may put it into the rural free delivery, pay the United States postage on that, and send it out to the farmer. Also, that the farmer can do exactly the same thing. He can take an 11pound package, compel the rural free-delivery carrier to take it at the postage provided by this postal bill, pay also the express charges, according to this other bill, and when the rural carrier gets to the nearest express town, being the end of his rural route, he must deliver it to the express company and send it on. It never was intended in this Post Office bill to limit in any way the business of the express companies.

Mr. MURDOCK. As I understand the gentleman's reading of this bill, the gentleman in Kansas City, Mo., can send to the gentleman at Anniston, Ala., a pound package for 12 cents. Is

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no.
Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, absolutely. Under the reading of the Post Office bill you can send a pound package from city to city for 12 cents.

Mr. BORLAND. Sixteen cents a pound.

Mr. MURDOCK. But this bill provides, in terms, that hereafter the postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents a pound. Is it not a fact that the gentleman at Kansas City, Mo., can send a package from his residence, weighing 1 pound, to the gentleman at Anniston, Ala., for 12 cents?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; if the gentleman is correctly reading the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. And is it not also true that a farmer outside of Kansas City, Mo., can not send from his residence on a rural route to the gentleman at Anniston, Ala., a package weighing 1 pound for 12 cents?

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that is true.
Mr. MURDOCK. Then, why the discrimination against the farmer's

Mr. BORLAND. That is the difficulty, but the farmer has the beautiful privilege of patronizing the express company for the entire haul that the express company can give. The farmer can use the rural route only to deliver and receive from the express company. Thus the rural carrier becomes the receiving and distributing agent of the express companies to increase their business by giving them the advantage of territory that they do not now reach. This is why the express companies are now opposing Postmaster General Hitchcock's plan for a rural parcel post.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon].

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Alabama begins, I understand that a farmer living on a rural route would not have the benefit of a general parcel rate. Would it not be true that the farmer on the rural route has the choice of two rates, and can either take the general rate or the local rate as he may choose?

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I have evidently misunderstood the gentleman from Kansas. I have no doubt but that he could send to me a pound of fourth-class mail matter to Anniston, Ala., from route 2, Wichita, Kans., for 12 cents, and there is no discrimination against the farmer in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in crossing the river when we get to The Adamson bill is not up and this bill is. Under the provisions of this bill a man living on a rural route can send to any point on that rural route 11 pounds for 25 cents, 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound. A man living on the rural route can send back to the person from the point where the route starts a similar package at the same rate. From Washington I can send a 1-pound package to a man living on a rural route at any point in the United States for 12 cents under the provisions of this bill—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes; but I would like for gentlemen to put their questions one at a time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to know as a matter of logic what the reasons were which animated your committee in limiting the sending of a parcel from point to point on a single Why did not you give to the farmer the privilege of sending his parcels from a point on one route to another point on another route leading out of the same post office?

Mr. BLACKMON. There are 21 members of the committee and I could not answer the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What was the guiding motive? Mr. BLACKMON. Well, I am not prepared to answer that. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Did not the committee have any motive:

Mr. BLACKMON. For myself I can answer.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. May I interrupt the gentleman from Alabama a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield;

Mr. BLACKMON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to suggest this: The first section of section 8 provides:

That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound, except as herein provided.

It is but an amendment of the statute that now is in existence, or rather it is a permission for the people of the United States to use an agreement that the United States carries out with foreign countries in regard to the use of its mails. gives 12 cents for the flat pound rate. That does not limit the transportation to rural routes or from city to city. It is a general law in its application, the same as the law that is now in force by international agreement, and the package may under that be sent to any other point in the United States whether it is on a rural route or not.

Mr. BLACKMON. I have just stated that. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The other section in the bill giving the lower rate for fourth-class matter means simply where the matter is delivered on a route for transportation on that route by a carrier, or to the initial office, the low rate applies to the rural route for matter beginning and ending on it. The 12 cents a pound rate is a general rate that covers the United States.

Mr. BLACKMON. I have said that.
Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLACKMON. If the gentleman will yield more time; there is another subject I wish to discuss.

Mr. WILLIS. We will get you more time. Why did the committee limit the sending of packages to the one rural route? I understand, under the provisions of the bill, if business were to originate at one rural route it could not be sent to the addressee on another rural route. Now, I want to know the reason for that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Simply because the committee was not establishing a general parcel post over the rural routes or for the country generally. It is providing for a commission, and it is a proposition to make an experiment on rural routes, and in making the experiment it was thought desirable to limit the service to each route.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman think it would increase the expense materially, and would the gentleman object to an amendment extending that service to all rural routes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The purpose of the act was to confine it to rural routes so that we could ascertain the exact facts. We did not propose to complicate it by extending it over two or three rural routes, but we desired to make the one exact experiment

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask the gentleman if this applies to what is called a loop route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. A loop route would be a part of the original route.

Mr. BURNETT. That is what I want to know if, under the construction of the chairman, that would be included.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think it would cover it; yes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACKMON. I will.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I live on a rural route. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, if the provisions of this bill should become a law, if I could not post a parcel at 12 cents a pound in the box in front of my door and have it carried anywhere in the United States?

Mr. BLACKMON. You could by paying 12 cents a pound up to 11 pounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition here presented has a fair prospect of becoming the law. Now, if it is an advantage to obtain a cheaper rate for transportation by the mail facilities, I say that we have here a proposition that gives to the American citizen a reduction in his fourth-class mail matter of 4 cents per pound. In other words, we reduce it from 16 cents per pound to 12 cents a pound and raise the weight limit from 4 to 11 pounds.

I contend that a man who claims to be working in the interest of the people and wants a cheaper rate, but opposes this bill on the idea of taking over the express companies, with a prospect of getting this reduction for the people, is not in favor of any kind or character of a parcel post. It means simply delay

I have introduced a bill requiring the railroad companies to handle packages up to 50 pounds, commonly known as express, and to handle it by the trains that now handle express, and charge a reasonable rate for the service performed, the fixing of rates being placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The same bill provides that when the consignor delivers the package to the carrier at the office of the carrier and the consignee receives the package at its destination at the office of the carrier a cheaper rate shall be charged for the service performed than if the carrier had collected and delivered the package by wagon or otherwise. I believe that that will ultimately, if it becomes a law, be a great and valuable saving to the people throughout the country who are now using the express companies. But I am not going to wait to get that bill out of the committee. I will support this bill, because it is up now, is a good bill, and we can pass it. I am not going to oppose this provision and wait to see if that bill or some other bill can be gotten out and placed before this House.

I am not an expert on the subject, and do not profess to be, but I say to you gentlemen who are interested in extending your rural routes, you gentlemen who are interested in keeping the routes that you have, when you vote for a law now to take effect on July 1 this year or July 1 next year, with our present facilities, that will allow 100-pound packages to go in the mail, consisting of poultry, eggs, butter, and live pigs, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Witherspoon] seems to think can be done, you will destroy your rural routes throughout the country.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Could you not pass this parcel-post provision that is now in the appropriation bill and stitute the Goeke idea now, just as well as you could substitute and inaugurate the Goeke bill by defeating this bill and putting the Goeke measure in place of the present law?

Mr. BLACKMON. I can only answer for myself. It might or might not be done. I imagine when we take over by law the express companies, if we ever do, it will be perhaps from 10 to 15 years from now, and I may never live to see it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Blackmon] has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. In answer to the gentleman, a moment ago you stated that a person on a rural route could send a package over the rural route and by express to a city

Mr. BLACKMON. I said by mail.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I mean by parcel post. Suppose I am a country merchant, with a store on a rural route, and I wish to send to Detroit or some other city for 10 pounds of tea, and I tell them to send it by parcel post. What would be the charge to deliver that to the country merchant upon the rural route?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. One dollar and twenty cents for a 10-pound package?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.
Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That would be a benefit.
Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor absolutely at all times of giving to the people the cheapest transportation rate either by post or express or by freight that can be fairly and legally given them. I am committed to that proposition, and so long as I remain in Congress I propose to vote to give the cheapest rate that can be fairly and legally given to the people by all modes of transportation.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Would not the gentleman want the rates to pay the expenses, so as not to impose a burden on the Post Office Department of the Government?

Mr. BLACKMON. I said, my friend, "a legal rate." Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. A rate may be legal and yet result in a great deficit to the Government.

Mr. BLACKMON. I perhaps have not read the same decisions that the gentleman has, but I understand under the law that a legal rate must be a rate that will bring a fair return on the amount invested.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. There is no investment on the part of the Government.

Mr. BLACKMON. Would a legal rate be a fair rate that took money unjustly from the Government?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The Government is losing millions of dollars a year on second-class mail. It has been going on from year to year, and yet it is not illegal.

Mr. BLACKMON. I said "fair and legal."
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman would have a rate either by the zone system or in some other way, that would save the department from a deficit, from the loss of that class of goods?

Mr. BLACKMON. I would be in favor of a fair and legal

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman mean a rate that would save the Government from loss on that class of goods? Does he?

Mr. BLACKMON. I think the Post Office Department, when we pass this law and with the information that we have obtained and the information which Congress and its committees will hereafter obtain, will not put in force a rate that will create any great deficit. That is my position.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes. Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Would the gentleman please state, for my information, just specifically how those who favor general parcel-post system would profit by the enactment of this provision?

Mr. BLACKMON. That is a question on which opinion is so much divided that I would prefer not to give my views on it.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the people will derive any particular benefit or relief from the standpoint of those seeking a general parcel post and be-lieving that it will be of benefit?

Mr. BLACKMON. It is my opinion that they think so, and it is my opinion that Congress ought to give to the American citizen the same right that we are giving to foreigners, and for that reason I am in favor of this bill. [Applause.] Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BLACKMON. I yield. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I just wanted to know whether any other motive influenced the committee in fixing the limit of weight at 11 pounds than the international postal arrangement.

Mr. BLACKMON. I can only speak for myself. I do not know what influenced the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was there any other motive than that, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. BLACKMON. I am not prepared to say what influenced the members of the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman has not spoken for himself in answer to that question.

Mr. BLACKMON. If the gentleman wants my personal views on that, I can give them.

I can give these personal views as formed by me after a careful consideration of this question in all its aspects. I have been anxious to know and to do what is right. Mr. Chairman, a great many gentlemen are suggesting that a general parcel post be created and that the number of pounds of fourth-class mail matter which they say should be authorized ranges from 11 to 100 pounds, and I have been unable to see any plan presented by these gentlemen that is susceptible of being successfully carried out. It is an easy matter indeed, and it may be good policy in certain localities to say that you favor a general parcel post, but when a man says this and fails to present a feasible plan I am strongly inclined to believe that he has either not given the matter the study to which the question is entitled or is talking to please his audience. Gentlemen argue that the Government should buy the express companies and carry packages not exceeding in weight 100 pounds. It is apparent, it seems to me, that if this plan is feasible it will take many years to put it into operation, and then it will not reach that class of people who are now without express facilities and those we are undertaking now to benefit. Others argue with any instance where any employee of the Post Office Department equal earnestness that the weight of parcel-post packages through the mail should be extended to 100 pounds, and that our rural mail facilities are now prepared to handle such packages. I do not believe that there is a rural route in the United States to-day where the equipment is sufficient for such purpose. A rural carrier starts out on his route; suppose he has several hundred pounds of mail to deliver on his route. He gets to a box 10 miles from the starting point and there he finds 10 pounds of butter, at the next box he finds 20 pounds of chickens, at the next box he finds two packages weighing 25 pounds each, all of which is there properly stamped or tagged for mailing. It is his duty, of course, to take all these packages. Suppose this state of affairs should continue on his entire route; what would be the situation? He returns to the starting point of his route. How many post offices are now equipped to receive and care for this character of mail? I say to you gentlemen who are interested in working this question out so as to give relief in the matter of transportation facilities must necessarily consider this from a practical standpoint and make the necessary preparations to carry out the scheme or it will be a dismal failure. The people of this country are intelligent people and they do not expect the unreasonable. I believe that the present bill will give much needed relief, and, as I have said, we now have an opportunity to get this, and to my mind a "bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." Those who argue that this bill will give no relief to the farmers I am constrained to believe and ill safety and the believe that the same of the same o to believe are ill advised on this subject. If a farmer under the present law desired to send to his market a package through the mall, he could only send a 4-pound package, which under the present law would cost him 64 cents. Under the law now proposed he could send 11 pounds of the same class and character of mail at a cost of 25 cents. In other words, 11 pounds under the proposed law would cost him 39 cents less than a 4pound package under the present law. If he desired to get from his market a similar number of pounds, without stopping his plow to go to town for the package, under the proposed law he could get the 11 pounds for 25 cents, whereas under the pres-ent law it would cost him $1.76 if he were allowed to mail 11 pounds, whereas he can only mail packages up to 4 pounds. will be observed from the proposed bill that there is nothing in the bill to prevent a merchant from sending to his customer in the country, living on a rural route, two 11-pound packages, or three packages if the facilities of the carriers are sufficient for him to handle same, totaling 33 pounds, in three different packages, for the sum of 75 cents for the three packages; whereas under the present postal rates 33 pounds in 4-pound packages, at 16 cents per pound, would cost him $5.28. I was reared on a farm, and I have seen the time in the busy crop season when a day's plowing was worth from five to ten dollars to me, and I have seen the time when I have had to stop work to go to town for articles which, under the provisions of this bill, could have been sent out through the mail had this law been in force; and I am therefore at a loss to know how the gentlemen can contend that this bill is not a benefit to the " CAG BULE."

Mr. Chairman, there is one other phase which I think ought to commend this bill to every Member of Congress. This bill proposes to abolish the objectionable gag law, and I have no doubt that there is not a single Member of Congress—at least I hope there is not a single Member of Congress—at least I hope there is not a single Member of Congress—that is in favor of the Executive order known as the "gag rule" that has prevailed since President Roosevelt issued that famous order. I do not believe that a single Member of this body believes that any President of any party, at any time, under any conditions, should have the right by an Executive order to suspend the Constitution of the United States of America. [Applause.]

This bill seeks to correct that, and we do correct it, and we provide that those men, in whatever employment they may be, may appeal to Congress, as the Constitution provides they may do, by a petition, through their Member of Congress or to Congress, and lay before their Congressman their grievances without being subjected to dismissal from the service because they do To my mind, I say, this is one of the strong provisions in this bill that ought to appeal to every Member of this body, and I imagine it does.

either lost his position or was reduced in it in any possible way by consulting with his Member of Congress or appealing to him for any sort of aid that he thought he ought to have?

Mr. BLACKMON. A great many of them think so, and whether they have or have not, I say that Congress stultifies itself when it allows an Executive order to suspend the Constitution of the United States, whether it has cost a man his job or not. Some of them say it has cost them their jobs.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, if no man has lost his position by reason of this gag rule, I am glad to know it, and I am in favor of fixing it so that he can not do so.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I have never heard of a man being criticized for it.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not true that President Taft has just now, pending the coming election, modified that to some extent? Mr. BLACKMON. Yes. It was not my intention to go into the political phase of it, but I think when President Taft heard the rumblings throughout this country and found all honest men decrying this position taken by his predecessor, Mr. Roosevelt, and enforced by himself, he changed this order, I will not say from political motives, but it was changed in the last few After the Democratic committee had reported this bill, and it was being considered on the floor of this House, it was then that the President saw fit to modify the order. [Applause.] This modification made by the President, to my mind, does not relieve the objectionable feature of the order, but the bill completely does so. I regard it as extremely dangerous, at any time or under any condition, to allow the President or anyone else, by any act or order to suspend the Constitution of the United States, that document that has for these many years proven the great bulwark of American liberties.

DEMOCRACY FAITHFUL TO THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Chairman, let me say in conclusion, since coming into control of the House less than two years ago, the Democrats have kept faith with the people by redeeming the pledges made by our party. They have passed through the House bills carrying reforms which the Democratic Party has been championing for many years. We have reduced the running expenses of the House alone, approximately, $200,000 per annum, found to be unnecessary and extravagant expenditures. This will serve to show what could be expected if the Democratic Party were in control of both branches of Congress and the executive branch of the Government. We have admitted to statehood Arizona and New Mexico, which has so long been delayed, notwithstanding each of these Territories possessed all the requifor statehood. It has been said, and undoubtedly truthfully so, that improper means have been used to secure the election of some Members to the House and Senate, and in order that the people might know what sum of money or what other influences have been brought to bear to secure the election of such Senators and Representatives, we have passed a bill, known as the publicity bill, requiring Senators and Congress-men to file a sworn statement of their account, showing all moneys spent by them or by any other person, firm, or corporation to secure the election of such Member. This statement must be filed 15 days prior to the primary or nominating convention in which the Member is seeking nomination or election; and also to file after the election a complete statement of all money expended, either by himself or any other person in his behalf. It would now seem that it would have been the part of wisdom to extend this provision to presidential candidates.

We have passed a large number of tariff bills, which, if enacted into law, would give, it is estimated by experts, relief in immense sums and which the people demand. The bills are as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it may be left to the people to say whether or not the Republican Party have been dealing fairly with them in not giving to them this needed relief during the past 30 years, in which time they have had almost continuous control of all branches of the Government. I appeal to all fair-minded, thinking men to say whether the President has dealt fairly with the people in not approving the measures passed by this Democratic House, effecting a saving of millions of dollars per year to the American people. Can the people longer trust the Republican Party to deal with these great questions, involving the happiness and prosperity of our Nation, when they have demonstrated that they do not favor a reduction in the tariff for the betterment of the toiling masses because such reductions are opposed by the great trusts which are delivered. tions are opposed by the great trusts which are daily increasing the burdens of the American people? The Republican Party went before the country with a solemn promise that the tariff on the necessaries of life should be reduced, and the people, trusting them, elected a Republican President, a Republican Senate, and a Republican House. Have they kept their promise? It is well known by all men that no sooner had they been treated into the content of the con installed into office than they passed what is known as the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, which law, instead of reducing the tariff on the necessaries of life, raised the duty on almost every commodity that the American people are compelled to use; and the President, believing that the people could be further de-ceived, stated in his Winona speech, shortly after Congress had adjourned and after he had approved the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, that it was the best tariff law that had ever been enacted. But our people were not to be fooled. They saw the prices of foodstuffs and manufactured articles going up day by day, with no increase in the wages of the workingmen of the country, and they knew that the Republican Party had further prothe they knew that the Republican Party had further protected the manufacturer but had failed to give relief to the long-suffering public. The country, being convinced that they could no longer hope for redress through the Republican Party, rose on massa in Navaraham 1910, and the response of the resp rose en masse in November, 1910, and turned out a large number of those Republicans who had failed to keep faith with the people and elected Democrats in their stead.

It is a source of congratulation, I say, that as fast as an opportunity has presented itself since the betrayal of the people by the Republican Party that in all parts of the country where elections have since occurred that the Republicans have been defeated and Democrats elected. Even in the rock-ribbed Republican State of Kansas, while the necessity for the special elections is a source of regret to us all, in the two special elections held in this State for the election of two Congressmen the Republicans were overwhelmingly defeated and Democrats elected. Mr. Chairman, when we consider the legislation enacted by the Democratic House in the short time we have been in control, is not the Nation to be congratulated upon having elected a Democratic House, which is watchful and mindful of the needs of our people, and who are undoing, as fast as they can, the injurious legislation enacted by the Republican Party during the past 30 years and attempting to place on the statute books reforms for which our people have so long been clamoring.

We may hope to see before this Congress adjourns legislation enacted preventing unlawful gambling in farm products, and a bureau of markets established which will give to the producer and the consumer exact and reliable information concerning the amount of production and the amount of consumption of the necessaries of life, the bureau to be under the direction and supervision of the Department of Commerce and Labor or the Department of Agriculture.

I believe, too, that we will enact at this session of Congress a bill which will be the beginning of Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of public highways throughout the

I believe also that we will pass a bill the effect of which will keep out of our fair land that undesirable class of immigrants which all American citizens, whether native or foreign born, agree should not be allowed to invade this country and press on us all sorts of grave and perplexing problems.

Mr. Chairman, when you hear the splendid work of this Democratic House being criticized, their efforts condemned and censured for not having acted with more dispatch, you may know that such individuals are not the real friends of good government, and that they are merely seeking to return to power in this House a Republican majority, with a hope that they will in the future, as they have in the past, legislate in the interests of the privileged class and against the welfare of the masses of our people.

I do not know how long I shall remain in this the greatest lawmaking body in the world, but so long as I do I expect to work and vote for laws that will mete out equal, absolute, and complete justice to the whole people; and when my service is finished here I shall feel my reward in that conscientiousness of having been faithful at all times to the interests of my constituents and the great masses of the American people.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Slayden having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 19212. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that Mr. Chamberlain was excused, on his own request, from further service as a conferee on the bill (S. 3367) to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to homesteads, and Mr. Newlands was appointed in his place.

Connecticut [Mr. Reilly].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the public mandate given us on our election to Congress was "to cut down the cost of living," and the tens of thousands of letters and petitions that have been coming to us, demanding an extended parcel post now seem to be conclusive evidence that we can not satisfy this mandate by any inadequate substitute. Our constituents know, if we do not, that the cost of our living and our opportunities for getting a living are chiefly a question of transport tariffs, and they are requesting us by these letters and petitions to cut down our transport tariffs by the extension of the service of the post office, our mutual transportation company. This is my interpretation of the letters and petitions that are coming to me, and believing, as I do, that the only practical way to settle our transport-tariff problem is by the extension of the post office over the whole business of public transportation, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 8083) providing for the establishment of a freight, passenger, and intelligence post, and in behalf of this bill, which might be substituted for the various public service valuation bills and small parcel-post bills now before Congress, I therefore present the following argument, prepared by James . Cowles, secretary treasurer of the Postal Progress League, for your consideration:

A FREIGHT, PASSENGER, AND INTELLIGENCE POST THE PUBLIC NEED.

A FREIGHT, PASSENGEB, AND INTELLIGENCE POST THE PUBLIC NEED.

In his article "Ethics of corporate management," in the North American Review of January 18, 1907, President Hadley, of Yale University, said that the demands of the various railway commissions for increased power in order to enable them to cope with the difficulties of the railroad problem reminded him of the minister in the country church who said, "O Lord, we pray for power; O Lord, we pray for power," until an old deacon, unable to contain himself, interrupted, "Tain't power you lack, my young man, its idees."

Far back in 1837 Rowland Hill, of England, discovered to the world the "idee" that within the limits of a public transport service the cost of its use is regardless the distance traversed by any unit of traffic upon the moving machinery, and upon this "idee" Mr. Hill based the English penny-letter post of 1839.

To-day this "idee" is the recognized law not only of the modern postal service of the world, it is the law of our city trolley services and of the through freight services of our railways. * *

THE POST OFFICE—OUR MUTUAL TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

THE POST OFFICE-OUR MUTUAL TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

The post office is our mutual transportation company. Its management, the terms and conditions of its use are subject to our will. Its only physical limitation is the capacity of the machinery of transportation. It is the only public transportation agency that covers the whole tion. It is the only public transportation agency that covers the whole country.

Its underlying principles are: Rates regardless of distance, regardless of the character or the volume of the matter transported; rates determined by the representatives of the ratepayers in Congress assembled, and on the cost of the service rendered. Within its limits all persons, places, and things are on a plane of the most perfect commercial equality. Up to its limits the humblest citizen on the most out-of-the way rural route is on a par with the richest corporation in our greatest metropolis.

In his speech in favor of a uniform 2-cent-letter rate, delivered in Congress February 21, 1839, Congressman Palfrey, of Massachusetts, spoke of the postal system of uniform rates as follows:

"The idea of charging higher postage on a letter on account of the greater distance it travels is an absurdity. The long routes are all made up of a series of short ones. Whether the letter or the 10,000 letters mailed at Boston shall stop at Worcester or go on to Galena will not make $1 difference, but a matter of fact, that the expense of the post office is practically the same whether a letter is going from London to a village 11 miles distant or to Edinburgh, 397 miles. The difference is not expressible in the same whether a letter is going from London to a village 11 miles distant or to Edinburgh, 397 miles. The difference is not expressible in the samelest coin we have. The average cost of the transportation of each letter, taking all the mails in the Kingdom, is estimated at one-ninth of a farthing." At this rate the average cost of the transportation of a half-ounce American letter is about one-half a mill, a rate which it is idle to think of graduating by distance.

At 10 cents a mile for transportation of a mail bag it may cost the about one-half a mill, a rate which it is idle to think of graduating by distance.

At 10 cents a mile for transportation of a mail bag it may cost the department a dollar to carry a single letter 10 miles, while 10,000 letters of another bag are carried at the same rate 100 miles, each costing for ten times the distance only one-thousandth part as much.

In 1862 Postmaster General Montgomery Blair suggested the application of this principle to a world postal service. In 1863, under the leadership of Abraham Lincoln, it was made the basis of the modern United States post office. In 1874 it became the basis of the modern United States post office. In 1874 it became the basis of the modern the exhaust of the modern World Postal Union, under which books are now posted anywhere throughout the world at a common rate of 1 cent each 2 ounces, setablished a general merchandise post, limited to 4-pound parcels, at the common world book rate for all distances within our territory. The Congress of 1885 gave to magazines and newspapers—registered second-class matter—a uniform cent-a-pound rate, and thus provided the American people with the greatest public school on earth.

American express companies apply this principle of uniform rates in their transportation of books, seeds, bulbs, etc., for planting—third-class mail matter—throughout their respective jurisdictions—New York to California—in parcels 10 pounds and over, at a rate just under that of the post office, with insurance up to $10. On magazines and newspapers—registered second-class mail matter—their uniform rates are Parcels, up to 10 pounds, 10 cents; larger parcels, 1 cent a pound, collect and deliver within distances covered by their merchandise rate of $4.50 a hundred pounds or within zones of 1,500 miles, east or west of the Ohio-Pennsylvania State line.

This principle of uniform rates is applied in the trolley service of every American city, and to it more than to anything else they owe their wonderful growth and prosperity. In 1888 Judge Cooley, of the I

BAILROADS DEFEND UNIFORM MILK RATES.

RAILROADS DEFEND UNIFORM MILK RATES.

In 1895 this uniform milk rate, which then covered distances up to 330 miles, was attacked by the Orange County milkmen on the issue that it deprived them of their natural monopoly of the New York milk market. The Hon, Joseph H. Choate, of New York, represented the milkmen. Messrs, Rogers, Locke & Milburn represented the railroads. At that time the uniform rates from points west of the Hudson to the railroad terminals opposite New York City were as follows:

On cream in 40-quart cans, 100-pound packets, 50 cents per packet, one-half cent a pound; in crates of 12-quart bottles, 70-pound packets, 15 cents per packet, it rife less than one-fourth cent a pound; on milk, 22 cents per packet, trifle less than one-third cent a pound in cans; 9.6 cents per packet, one-seventh cent a pound in crated bottles. The empty packets weighed, cans, about 20 pounds; crated bottles, 30 to 35 pounds. The weight of the filled-bottle packets was partly due to the lee in which they were packed, and the above rates paid not only for two handlings of these filled packages and their transportation to the Hudson, opposite New York, they also covered the Icing of the milk in summer, the heating of the cars in winter, and the return of the empty packets to their stations of origin.

UNIFORM RATES TOO HIGH.

With all this service the business was exceedingly remunerative to all engaged in the traffic, their rates, according to Mr. Choate, being from two to three times the cost of the service rendered. In the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad the business was so profitable that the railroad managers actually paid their milk contractor, Westcott, $50,000 a year as his share of the plunder. In the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, which then transported about one-fourth of the milk brought by rail to New York, the president of the road determined the rates, and accepted as the share of his associate stockholders 80 per cent of the receipts, giving 20 per cent to Westcott. In other words, the actual milk pay received by the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad was 25.6 cents per 40-quart milk can, weighing filled 100 pounds, empty 20 pounds, and about the dimensions of a half barrel; and on bottled crates, weighing filled 75 pounds, empty 30 to 35 pounds, and of dimensions 12 by 12 by 24 inches (13 bushels), 7.68 cents; 83 per cent of the entire business originated beyond Binghamton, N. Y., 206 miles from Hoboken, and on this part of the business every car and crate was hauled a round trip of at least 412 miles, each single trip involving a haul of heavy grades over the Catskill Mountains on special trains made up of refrigerator cars costing about $2.500 each, iced in summer and heated in winter. The Lackawanna milk trains averaged 8 cars, and ran on a schedule time of 40 to 45 miles an hour. The average load of the cars was 150 cans, weighing filled on their way to New York 8 tons and on the return trip 12 tons. In this business, according to Mr. Choate, the milk cars of the Eric Railroad earned twenty-six times as much as the average freight car and nearly 80 per cent more than their average passenger car.

This old New York milk traffic compares well with the mall service rendered the Government by the railroads and less injurious to their cars than that of either milk cans o

RAILEOADS DEMAND UNIFORM CONTINENTAL RATES

RAILROADS DEMAND UNIFORM CONTINENTAL RATES.

In December, 1895, Commissioner George R. Blanchard, of the Joint Traffic Association, testifying in behalf of the uniform rate on milk to New York before the Interstate Commerce Commission, declared that there was no reason why it should not be extended to a thousand miles, and Messirs, Rogers, Locke & Milburn, counsel of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, said:

"The distance within which the rate on milk should be uniform need only be limited by the time required to make it with the train and meet the wants of the New York market with milk not affected by its transportation.

"The cost of train operation is not appreciably more whether there be 200 cans in a car or 160 cans in a car or 17 cans in a car. The same crew, the same messengers and organization, and the same from Binghamton or not or from Sussex County or not, and the cost of the delivery of the can at the Hoboken terminal is in no real sense dependent upon the length of its haul."

In his great work, The Economic Theory of Railway Location, Arthur M. Wellington says: "As a matter of purely public policy—that is to say, if the interests of the railways were identical with the Interests of the community as a whole—railway rates should be the same for all distances."

Note also this testimony as to the uniform rates of the railways in

Note also this testimeny as to the uniform rates of the railways in their through traffic, set forth before the railway-rate committee of the United States Senate of 1905 at Washington:

IOWA'S PROSPERITY DUE TO APPLICATION OF THE POSTAL PRINCIPLE IN THROUGH BAILWAY TRAFFIC.

THROUGH RALLWAY TRAFFIC.

Hon, L. S. Coffin, late railroad commissioner of Iowa: "Some 40 years ago the agricultural papers announced the fact that a shipment of butter from Pavenport, Iowa, and a shipment of butter from central New York and a similar shipment from St. Albans, Vt., were brought to Boston in the same car and the freight rate on the butter from St. Albans and from central New York was the same as that from Davenport." And Mr. Coffin went on to say that the position of Iowa as the foremost of the States in agriculture was due to the fact that this system of uniform rates on dairy products had put her on a level as to the cost of transportation with localities 500 or 1,000 miles nearer the great marks of trade. To this custom was due the fact that his farm, which is a thousand miles farther from the great markets of New York and Boston, was worth as much for dairy purposes as farms in New York or Vermont. It was this application of the postal principle to railway traffic that had brought to him his prosperity and had enabled him to so educate his children that they could be as intelligent as the children of farmers living near those great markets. "We want this same thing to go on; we want the farmers a thousand miles away from a great market to be as prosperous and his children to have the same and as good facilities for intelligence as the children of farmers only a hundred miles away," and, finally, he concluded: "There should be no wholesale rates as against retail rates; no more so than in buying postage stamps.

GROUPED RATES IN THROUGH TRAFFIC DEVELOP AGRICULTURE IN THE

in buying postage stamps.

GROUPED RATES IN THROUGH TRAFFIC DEVELOP AGRICULTURE IN THE WEST, MANUFACTURES IN THE EAST.

Prof. Hugo R. Meyer, late of Chicago University: "The one thing which has done more than all others for the development of this country is the common custom of the railways to group large districts of territory with a uniform rate, regardless of distance. Except for this system of grouped rates we never should have seen the years when we built 10,000 and 12,000 miles of railway, for there would have been no farmers west of the Mississippi River who could have used the land opened up by those railways. Except for these grouped rates we could not have in New England a great boot and shoe industry or a great cotton-milling industry; we could not have spread throughout New York and Pennsylvania and Ohio manufacturing industries of the most diversified kinds, because those industries would have had no market among the farmers west of the Mississippi River."

The existence of New England industries dependent on through

THE EXISTENCE OF NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRIES DEPENDENT ON THROUGH UNIFORM RATES.

President Tuttle, of the Boston & Maine Railroad: "The boot and shoe industry of New England flourishes," says Mr. Tuttle, "because of the common rate—1½ cents per pair on shoes carried 20 to 1,400 miles. The barbed-wire industry of Worcester, Mass., continues to employ 5,000 hands because of the common rate which Worcester enjoys with Pittsburgh to all the West. The textile industries of Massachusetts flourish because of their grouped rates over a great part of the Lighted States.

THROUGH UNIFORM BATES CREATE NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRY.

But this system of low uniform rates not only keeps industries flourishing; it creates industries. "In the northern part of Maine," says Mr. Tuttle, "there are hundreds of thousands of acres of spruce lands. Up to within 10 years ago in certain parts of Maine there were no inhabitants. At a certain place there was primeval forest, not containing even a hundred cabins. A railroad was put into that territory—the Bangor & Aroostook. Certain capitalists discussed the establishment of a pulp and paper mill in that region. They selected a place where they could bond a large quantity of timber land with a good water power and where the other conditions for manufacturing were satisfactory and called it Millinocket.

" NEAR-BY MARKETS TGO SMALL FOR MODERN INDUSTRIES,

"Near-by Markets too small for modern industries.

"In order to establish a profitable industry up there it was necessary to manufacture upon a scale sufficiently large to make the product cheap, and this meant a production very much in excess of what could be used in the nearer markets. So they came to the railroad and said: "We want to know what rate you will charge to carry our products to Boston, New York, and Chicago, and all about us, and then we can determine whether we can build that mill." Then the railroad had to bear in mind that Chicago was receiving paper from other mills within 500 miles from Chicago, and if the Maine mill was to compete with these mills it must have the same rate for its 1.400 to 1.500 mile haul as they had for the 500-mile haul. The railroad therefore equalized its rates, so that the company could put their products into the markets of the United States. As a result, we have this place, Millinocket, with its schools, churches, streets, electric lights, and its population of 3,000 or 4.000, who live as comfortably as they do anywhere in the world, a place where 10 years ago it was primeval forest. To illustrate further in regard to this product, paper, we have other mills in different parts of New England producing paper which is sent to the same markets. We have to equalize the cost of transport, regardless of distance between all these mills, so that the product shall be sold in the market at the same price."

WHY NOT HAVE UNIFORM BATES IN ALL PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION?

Manifestly a system of transport rates so useful in through traffic could hardly fail to be of equal benefit in local business. Strange as it may appear, however, though our railways ignore distance over continental areas, they carefully mark up the miles in local traffic, and investigation will prove that in many cases the very lowest less-thancarload rate for the very shortest distance is higher than the through rate for very long distances. In the course of the legislative hearings at Boston in 1900, relative to the issue "The State management of the Boston & Albany Railroad v. The New York Central management of this great State highway." President Tuttle, of the Boston & Maine Railroad, gave these as the figures charged for the transportation of flour in carloads from Ogdensburg, 429 miles via the Rutland Railroad and his own road, to Boston:

Passengers will be insured against injury or loss of life and also against

EVILS OF PRESENT TRANSPORT DISCRIMINATIONS—BIG DEALERS GIVEN LOW UNIFORM RATES OVER CONTINENTAL AREAS—SMALL DEALERS IMPRISONED IN NARROW SLAVE PENS.

Under present conditions the value-of-the-service system of rates, rates according to distance and the value of the service rendered, is quite strictly applied in general passenger traffic and in local freight traffic. In through freight traffic, on the other hand, large dealers and large producers are generally given uniform rates over large areas of territory regardless at once of distance and of the character of their commodities. As to travel, they are usually provided with cheap mileage books, if not with free travel. Almost all west-bound commodities destined to Pacific-coast terminals have a common blanket rate, regardless of distance and regardless of the character of the commodity from all points east of the Missouri River, and on their east-bound traffic from the Pacific-coast terminals to points east of the Missouri River they also enjoy a common blanket rate on their through carloads over zones of many hundreds of miles.

Ordinary CITIZENS TAXED "ALL THE SUBJECT WILL BEAR."

ORDINARY CITIZENS TAXED "ALL THE SUBJECT WILL BEAR."

The ordinary citizen, on the other hand, receives very different treatment. Unable to invest in a thousand-mile mileage book, my tax New York to and from Washington is $11.30. My wealthier friend, occupying the seat beside me and the owner of a mileage book, pays for the same service $9.04, and Congress, whose business it is to secure equality of privileges and rights to all the people, forces the ordinary citizens of the United States to submit to this discriminating faxation. The day laborer is infinitely worse off than I. Even under the best conditions—with fares at but 2 cents a mile—he is taxed 20 cents—10 per cent of his $2 a day earnings—for a round trip to and from a short job, but 5 miles from his home. If his job be 25 miles distant, his round trip costs him $1, or 50 per cent of his earnings. This for a service which, under Government ownership of the railways, could be profitably done at a charge of not over 10 cents a round trip. The Government railways of Belgium furnished even lower rates than this to Belgian workmen as long ago as 1883, and the business was exceedingly profitable.

INDIVIDUAL ENTERPRISE CRUSHED—SMALL DEALERS AND INDIVIDUAL ENTERPRISE CRUSHED—SMALL DEALERS AND SMALL PRODUCERS DRIVEN OUT OF EXISTENCE—THE BIG TOWN ENRICHED, THE SMALL TOWN IMPOVERISHED.

SMALL TOWN IMPOVERISHED.

The small dealer and the small producer suffer the same discriminating taxation as the workman. The rates on their local traffic and their less-than-carload business are sometimes 50 per cent higher than those of their great competitors engaged in carload traffic covering continental areas. The great dealer of the interior unquestionably sends his produce to Europe on occasion at a less tax than that levied on similar produce of the small dealer sent to our seaboard for home consumption. The large towns at railway terminals get far lower rates than are accorded to the smaller towns between the terminals.

accorded to the smaller towns between the terminals.

THE PRIVATE EXPRESS COMPANY KILLS THE SMALL TOWN.

The private express custom of taxing an additional rate for each line over which a parcel passes makes the establishment of a business requiring express service in small towns an impossibility. Such business must be located, if it would be successful, at great centers where several express lines diverge and where supplies and produce are usually subject to but one expressage.

Boise, Idaho, is controlled by the Pacific Express Co. Buffalo and Cleveland, on the Pacific Express line, enjoy several other express services. The smaller towns near by, subject to a second express charge, pay nearly twice as much as Buffalo and Cleveland on their Pacific Express business; to Boise, Idaho, on 8-pound parcels from Buffalo, N. Y., 2.437 miles, $1.20; Batavia, N. Y., 2.473 miles, $2.20; Cleveland, Ohio, 2,295 miles, $1.20; Euclid, Ohio, 2,300 miles, $2.20. With similar discriminations on all their express business, the fate of these smaller towns is evident.

smaller towns is evident.

THE PRIVATE EXPERSS COMPANY KILLS THE SMALL MANUFACTURER, FARMER, AND DEALER.

Rates from New York: Where the express rate on a 100-pound parcel pay $1.40; ten 10-pound parcels pay $80 cents; four 25-pound parcels pay $1.40; ten 10-pound parcels pay $3. Where a 100-pound parcel pays $1, two 50-pound parcels pay $1.60; four 25-pound parcels pay $2.20; ten 10-pound parcels pay $4.50.

The smaller the business, the higher the tax; the small business goes to the wall. The late 300 per cent dividend of the Wells-Fargo Express Co. is striking evidence of the express exploitation of the general public.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.

"Our present system of making railway rates," said Interstate Commerce Commissioner Prouty, January 12, 1903, "is taxation without representation in its most dangerous form." This taxation now amounts to over $2,500,000,000 a year, to over $150 a year for the average American family. In the determination of these taxes the taxpayers have no share. These taxes continue to be levied upon the principle "what the subject will bear." They always discriminate in favor of the big dealer and the big producer as against the small dealer and the small producer and against the little town and in favor of the big town. The result is the rapid concentration of our population in great cities within which laborers are huddled in narrow slave pens, while those who are enriched by this taxation live in palaces in other sections of the same city.

And the railway legislation proposed for the consideration of the Sixty-second Congress offers us a future almost worse than the past.

The railway speculators left in control of our public highways are to be deprived of inducements for the improvement and extension of their transport agencies, while transport taxation is to be left in a chaos that can not fail to result in widespread disaster.

PREDICTION OF CARROLL D. WRIGHT, 1894.

The Hon. Carroll D. Wright foretold the present condition of things in his notable address on the Chicago strike of June, 1894:

"The Chicago strike is epochal in its influence," he said, "because it emphasizes the claim that there must be some legislation which shall place railroad employees on a par with railroad employers in conducting the business of transportation, so far as the ferms and conditions of employment are concerned; because the events of that strike logically demand that another declaration of law and of the principles of the Federal Government shall be made; a declaration that all wages paid as well as charges for any service rendered in the transportation of property, passengers, etc., shall be reasonable and just. It has emphasized the power of the Federal Government to protect its great interests in the transportation of the mails."

Personally, he added, he was opposed to the Government management of the railroads, but if it came it would come because of a great necessity, and good citizens should have no fear. When it came, morroover, it would be not at the demand of the labor involved in carrying on the work of transportation, but "at the demand and in the interest of the railroads and of the shippers," and the movement would be most seductive.

The demand would be that the Government should take charge of rainfoads and of the supports, ductive.

The demand would be that the Government should take charge of the roads—not purchase them—should take charge of the roads, and out of the proceeds of the transportation business guarantee to the existing stockholders a small but reasonable dividend. And this seductive movement would command the support of the conservative men of the country, of the stockholders themselves.

RAILWAYS-POST ROADS.

This dictum thrown out by ex-President Roosevelt in his speeches at Indianapolis, Ind., and at Lansing, Mich., in the spring of 1907 suggests the seductive movement predicted by Mr. Wright, and the times now seem ripe for its consideration.

A TRANSPORT PROGRAM.

A TRANSPORT PROGRAM.

President Roosevelt's reference to the railways as post roads suggests the following transport program:

1. Government control and guaranty of fair return on investments. The National Government, under its constitutional power over post roads, to take control of the entire business of public transportation and to guarantee to the holders of transport securities a return on their investments equal to the average annual return of the past 10 years, a similar return on their cost to be guaranteed on roads recently built. (This will insure absolute safety to the investments of savings banks and similar associations. It will insure more than a square deal to railway speculators.)

2. Maintenance, extension, and operations of post roads.

The maintenance, extension, and operation of the consolidated system to be under the control and management of an extended postal department, including the Engineering Corps of the Army and Navy; all postal employees to be enlisted as men are now enlisted in the Army and Navy. The Government engineers intrusted with the building and maintenance of the Panama Canal may be safely intrusted with the care of all our public highways. To prevent waste, the post-road policy of the Mational Government should be the same as the highway policy of the different States, viz: Any community, town, county, or State asking for an extension of post roads should pay some share of the cost. Local roads may, perhaps, be left to local control, as local roads are now left to the care of the smaller communities within the different States. But the whole business must be under the general jurisdiction of the National Government.

3. Funds.

As to funds, United States 2 per cent 30-year bonds are worth 101. The new postal savings banks will offer the Government an opportunity to secure funds for the improvement and extension of its post roads at 2 per cent. A large part of the funds needed for this purpose may be secured, indeed, without the payment of any interest by the issue of post possible rate for collection and delivery, to the end that we may have a universal dcor-to-door rate within the entire public service.

* The possibilities as to low transport rates under a well-coordinated system of transportation are altogether beyond imagination. It is estimated that a saving of $50,000,000 a year could be made in the transport service of the city of New York alone if the entire business were in the hands of one well-equipped organization, run in the public interest. Vice President Buckland, of the New York. New Haven & Hartford Railroad, is quoted as saying that $15,000,000 a year could be saved to the people within his railroad province under a door-to-door freight-transport service undertaken by the railroad in connection with the trolley lines. The time is near at hand when heat and light and power, derived from coal, transformed into electricity at the mine, and conveyed by cable to the place of use will free the railroad from the transport of coal, and the cars now employed for this purpose will be free for the transport of general merchandise.

5. Hours and wages of labor.

Not over 8 hours per day, not over 48 hours a week, the hours and the wages of labor to be determined by the Representatives of the people in open Congress. (Experience has abundantly proved that long hours of service in this nerve-destroying employment are at once dangerous to the public and deathly to the workman. Insured through his Representatives in Congress a share in determining the hours of his work and his remuneration, the worker upon the post roads will have no occasion to strike.)

6. The extended Post Office Department.

The new department of post offices and post roads to manage the entire service of transportation and transmission may be composed of 1 member of the National Cabinet and 10 or more associates, each of whom shall be at the head of a postal division corresponding to one of the groups into which the railway system of the country has been divided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and be assisted by an advisory council made up of the governors of the different States.

The pending substitution of electricity for steam, resulting, as it surely will, in a very large reduction of transportation expenses, makes the present hour a most appropriate time for the consideration of this program. Uncle Sam, the representative of all of us, may be safely intrusted with the interests of each of us.

"Upon the postal service more than upon anything else does the general economic as well as the social and political development of the country depend." (Postal Commission, 59th Cong., Jan. 28, 1907.)

And what is true of the United States of America is equally true of the world.

the world.

SCIENTIFIC POSTAL MANAGEMENT.

"Scientific management," says Louis Brandeis, "would reduce the expenses of our great post roads a million dollars a day." The mere substitution of a system of prepaid cost of the service rates (less-than-carload rates, station to station, 10 cents on a 200-pound parcel, 4 cubic feet space; carload rates, 50 cents a ton, 40 cubic feet space) for the tens of millions of the "what the traffic will bear" collect rates of to-day would reduce railway expenses by many thousands of dollars a day.

Railways are post roads; railway trains are post wagons; railway rates are post-road taxes; they must be determined by the Representatives of the ratepayers in Congress assembled and on the postal prin-rates are post-road taxes; they must be determined by the respectives of the ratepayers in Congress assembled and on the postal principle.

Under a scientifically managed post office, covering the general business of public transportation, post-road trains would run from starting point to destination over lines of the lowest grades, least obstructive curves, and shortest distance. Mechanical power—taking the place of man power in the loading and unloading of parcels—L. C. L.—freight—would cut down the cost of that branch of public transportation, says the efficiency engineer, S. B. Fowler, from 75 cents to 19 cents a ton, and on the basis of the over 600,000,000 tons of that character of freight handled by our railway post roads in 1909 would save over $300,000,000 a year. The mechanical handling of carload freight by the Government, effting the two days of the present private service down to one day, would double the capacity of our transport equipment.

The railway expert, Harrington Emerson, estimates a possible reduction in the railway fuel bill of $60,000,000 a year and of half the time spent by locomotives in repair shops. The general substitution of electricity for steam will greatly reduce transport costs. The transformation of coal into electricity at the mines and its transmission by cable will leave our coal cars—about one-third of our whole freight-car equipment—open for other uses.

The Railway Age of February 10, 1911, states the present service of the average American freight car as follows:

	New England.	General average.
Average daily trip	16.8 $2.53	24.8 $2.79

In the International Postal Union, projected by the United States Postmaster General, Montgomery Blair, and inaugurated by the great German postmaster general, Dr. Stephan, in 1874, we have a United States of the world, with all mankind joined together by an international postal service soon to include a system of international postal cables and international postal transports and to continue increasing in extent and in efficiency until the time shall quickly come when the weakest hand, the most timid voice, shall reach to the ends of the earth and command its richest treasures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks] that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Akin] objected to his request to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I should like to ask the gentleman what he intends to say in his remarks?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be senior minority member of the committee which has charge of this legislation. I should not, of course, attempt to discuss anything that did not relate to this subject if I was going to speak at all. However, I withdraw the request.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his objection. There being no objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts has unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. WEEKS. I withdraw my request.
Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. MURDOCK. What happens when a gentleman withdraws his request for unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and the other gentleman withdraws his reservation of the right to object?

The CHAIRMAN. It is optional with the gentleman whether he will extend his remarks or not.

he will extend his remarks or not.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing an article by Stuart Perry, of Michigan, on the subject of postage. He has given the subject a good deal of attention, and it contains much valuable information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, upon this bill now pending before the House it has just occurred to me that a bill I have introduced, having for its object the classification of the presidential postmasters and taking them out of political control, and, in fact, placing the entire Post Office Department beyond the control of partisan politics, would be very opportune and proper at this time. I do not care to make any extended remarks on the subject or to take up the time of the House at this late hour, but it has occurred to me that I might get consent of the House to extend remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my bill by printing a magazine article that appeared in the Editorial Review for the month of March. I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing that article.

The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who the article is by.

Mr. NORRIS. It is an article of my own. My principal object in trying to get it into the RECORD is to give the gentleman from New York and others an opportunity to read it. It will be good reading for him and for everybody else, and will, I trust, give him some useful and valuable information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

WHY NOT TAKE THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT OUT OF POLITICS? (By George W. Norris, of Nebraska.)

"The Post Office Department can be likened to a great corporation. In the proper performance of all the duties pertaining to this great department it reaches into every nook and corner of the country. It comes nearer and closer to the people than any other department of government. Its officials and employees come in contact with every business, with every society, with every organization, with every home. Its financial transactions run into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Business, commerce, religion, education-all depend upon it to carry out their various functions. It is like the arteries of the human system. It reaches everywhere and assists every citizen, be he great or small, in carrying out his duties and fulfilling his obligations. We are all daily dependent upon it for the success of our business enterprises, for the education of our children, and for the happiness and comfort of all our people. If we should suspend the operation of the Post Office Department for one day, we should all be completely lost in a maze of bewilderment. It does not cease its work and its operation when nightfall empties the counting house, closes up business offices, empties our schools, and drives the busy life from off our crowded streets; but while we are all slumbering in peace, recruiting and renewing our strength for a new day, its employees and faithful servants are tolling during the weary hours in the performance of their various duties, separating on busy pounding railway trains or in countless city post offices the millions of missives, messages, and documents that shall in the coming morn be promptly placed in the waiting hands of millions of citizens.

"In all this great department, from the faithful rural carrier who delivers mail to the farmer upon the far western plains to the Postmaster General who sits in his luxurious office in our Nation's Capital, there is not a single, solitary duty to be performed by any of its countless employees and officials that is either directly or indirectly of a partisan political nature. In addition to the vast number of employees in this department there are thousands of others, working in mills and factories, preparing equipment and equipage that shall be used by these post-office employees in the performance of their official duty. Altogether they constitute a great army, working with ceaseless vigor for the success and happiness of all the people, regardless of creed, religion, or politics. There is nothing like it in all the civilized world. It has been found necessary, in order to make this great department effective and workable, to remove the major portion of the employees from partisan political control. In this great army the privates—the men who do the work—are already under the civil service. The major generals, the colonels, the captains, the lieutenants, the bosses are still subject to removal on account of political affiliation, and are appointed not because of their efficiency or experience in the affairs of the Post Office Department, but because of their influence in politics and their ability to control and manipulate political affairs. What should we think, for instance, of the great Pennsylvania Railroad Co. if, when there was a vacancy in the presidency of that great corporation, the stockholders should select a president who had had no experience in railroad affairs, excepting to occasionally ride in a palace car, and put in control of that great institution a man who was selected entirely on account of his ability to control the votes of his fellow citizens. How long would this company remain out of the hands of a receiver if, in addition to that, the stockholders should announce that hereafter there would be no opportunity or chance for the employees of the company to be promoted on account of efficiency, but that conductors, roadmasters, freight agents, and general managers would be selected not by promotion of men already in the em-ploy of the company, but from men outside of the service, on account of the political influence such persons might possess in the community where they resided?

"There are nearly 8,000 presidential postmasters in the United States. Almost without exception these men have been selected not because of any knowledge they possessed of the duties pertaining to the office or their understanding of the various workings of the Post Office Department, but because of their political influence in their respective communities. I know of an enterprising, beautiful city in the State of Ohio where the assistant postmaster has been in the post-office service for nearly 20 years. He understands every detail of the work. There is not a single, solitary duty connected with the post office in that city that he could not take up and perform with practical perfection. He gets a salary of $1,100 a year. There is no way for him to be promoted, unless he has a political pull. He himself is under the civil service and can not be removed except for cause, but he has reached the limit and under the law can not be advanced or promoted. He possesses knowledge gained from his experience and has the ability properly to take control in a much wider and broader field. He knows all about the post office and the Post Office Department, but he knows nothing about politics, has never had any experience as a politician, and has no liking or ability to control a political machine nor handle men in a political way. In that city there was recently appointed a postmaster who had never had any experience in post-office affairs. I presume he had never looked outward from behind a post-office counter. He was a man of high social standing and re-spectability. He knew nothing about post-office affairs, but he knew all about political affairs. He was the most prominent politician in the town. He controlled more votes than any other man there. He went into this post office at a salary of $2,400 per annum, the largest-salaried official in that city. sistant postmaster gives him the necessary instructions as to the performance of his duties. One does the work, the other draws the salary. He will in time become efficient without doubt, but by the time he does become efficient political conditions may have changed. There is even now a bitter fight between two factions in his political party for supremacy and control. If his faction loses he will go out of office, and the faithful assistant postmaster will have a new man to instruct and to break in.

We have in the city of Washington four Assistant Postmasters General. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has control over more than 40,000 rural routes scattered all over the country. He also has the custody of all the supplies for the entire Post Office Department, and has control of the disbursement of the same. His jurisdiction reaches every section of the country. The proper performance of his official duties requires a vast knowledge of the intricacles of the system and the duties of his office can not be fully, properly, and economically performed without long study and experience in the great department which he controls,

"The Second Assistant Postmaster General has control of the Railway Mail Service. He has charge of the transportation of mail by railroads. It is his duty to arrange all the details connected with the transportation of foreign mails. the way that star-route contractors perform their service. He has charge of matters pertaining to the furnishing of mail bags and other paraphernalia connected with the administration of the Post Office Department.

"So we might go on through the entire list. All of these Postmasters General are political appointees, but their duties are nonpolitical, nonpartisan. They can not properly perform them until they have studied and learned from experience the intricacies connected with the various departments of the service. Men are usually appointed to fill these places either as a reward for political service, or because they are expected to perform through their official places political services for some friend or some political machine. Like the postmasters, they must be instructed in the proper performance of their official duties by men who have been in the service and who have learned from experience what those duties are. Let us take the position of Postmaster General. If we examine the duties prescribed by law for the Postmaster General, we should look in vain for any official duty that is in any way connected with politics. He is the head of what ought to be a great business He is the president of the greatest corporation on earth. In his official capacity he has nothing to do with politics, and yet because of his connection with this great concern he has, through his inferior officials and through all presidential post offices scattered all over the country, the power of the greatest political machine in the country.

"Why should the tenure of office of a postmaster in Kansas or Nebraska depend upon the opinion of the President of the United States as to what kind of a tariff we ought to have? Why should a postmaster be removed and a new, inexperienced man be put in his place simply because one faction in a political party had succeeded in nominating a different man for Congress? In other words, why should the office of postmaster be a political partisan football? Why should we change postmasters simply because we change Congressmen? Why change postmasters all over the country every time there is a change of administration in Washington? Why not conduct this great corporation on a business basis? Why should we not provide by law that where an employee has shown by his ability that he is capable of wider fields of operation he should be promoted or transferred to some better position where the country can get the benefit of his usefulness? When a railroad president finds that an agent in some little town has ability beyond the scope of his particular station, he promotes him and gives him a better position. Men who formerly worked on the section have been promoted until they became presidents of great railway corporations, and it is a historical fact that such men make the best presidents. They know every detail of every position. They have learned from experience how to economize, how to safeguard, and how to increase business.

"Every postmaster knows that he will lose his position just as soon as his party loses control of the National Government, or what is equally uncertain, just as soon as his faction in his political party loses its control. On account of this uncerOn account of this uncertain tenure the postmaster does not give up his business profession or calling. It would be wrong to expect him to do so. He must be prepared for the day which he knows is coming when he will be put out of office and again be dependent upon his own efforts for a livelihood. The Post Office Department ought to receive all his time and all his energy. If he shows exceptional ability and competency, it ought to be possible to promote him in the service. Under present conditions the man who is postmaster has no way, regardless of the ability he may display, for promotion. He has reached his limit. This is not true of any business concern in the civilized world. It ought to be possible for a clerk or postmaster in a country town, without political influence or political pull, but by his own ability, his own industry, to reach the highest position in the service and become the head of the department in Washington. It ought to be possible for the railway-mail clerk to advance, step by step, and eventually, on account of his own competency, reach the position of Second Assistant Postmaster General. If this were possible, we should have new life in the Post Office Department. Every employee would be moved by a laudable and honest ambition to reach the higher positions in the department. Men instead of going into the department for temporary purposes only would enter it as a life profession. Postmasters instead of devoting their time and their attention to looking after and keeping in touch with private affairs would devote all their time, all their energies, to the betterment and upbuilding of the Post Office Department. It would become a profession by itself, where ability and competency would be displayed for the improvement and the economical administration of the department. nomical administration of the department,

"To bring about such a condition would require but a slight change in the law. We ought to provide by law for the appointment of postmasters by promotion from men already in the service, for the transfer of post-office officials, railway-mail clerks, etc., from one place to another. The entire system ought to be managed under rules and regulations provided by the Civil Service Department. The entire department should be absolutely divorced from partisan consideration or control.

"The position of Postmaster General ought to be taken out of politics. His term of office ought to be for a term of at least 10 years, and there ought to be specific provisions of law that he should administer the affairs of this great department along business lines and that no partisan political influence should have anything to do with the appointment or promotion of any of the officials.

"Under present conditions the Post Office Department is and must necessarily be a great political machine. In round numbers, there are 8,000 presidential postmasters in the country. Under Republican administration there are some States where postmasters alone completely dominate the political situation and absolutely control conventions. If we had a Democratic administration, there would be other States in other sections of the country where Democratic appointees would name delegates and control Democratic conventions. In other sections where the party in power was not completely dominated by the bribery of official patronage, this army of political appointees would, nevertheless, have great influence, and in many instances would be able to hold the balance of power in the selection of delegates and in the control of conventions. We do not have to study ancient history to obtain proof of these facts. The demonstration can be observed in any community by any man who will open his eyes and look. And what is going on to-day is only a repetition of what has happened many times in the years that are gone-happened under the administration of both of the great political parties. Practically every post office in the land is an active, living reminder of the existence of this great political machine—a machine that has controlled conventions in every section of the country. In the recent past it has several times nominated candidates for President, and even now, within the protection of its long shadow, are quietly resting its willing delegates to an approaching national convention.

"But it is not the intention of this article to offer any criti-

"But it is not the intention of this article to offer any criticism against political parties nor to censure any of our public officials. Much might be said along these lines, but I desire for the present, at least, to eliminate such consideration. As long as the system remains as it is conditions will be the same, no matter what political party is in control. It is perfectly natural that an appointee should be friendly to the party from which he receives his appointment and to the official or the boss who makes the recommendation that brings about his appointment. I am not complaining because postmasters work and contribute funds for the political party or the political faction that puts them in office. They would be guilty of ingratitude if they did not. They are expected to do this under our present system by the people of the community where they live. I am not complaining that Congressmen are anxious to recommend postmasters who are their friends and belong to their faction of their political party. It is perfectly natural that they should do this. I am not finding fault because a President refuses to appoint postmasters who are unfriendly to him or to his administration. Under the law as it now is, it would not be human to expect him to do otherwise. Human nature is the same, regardless of what political party may be in power. It is the system that is wrong, and relief can not come by simply changing the men in control.

"All patriotic citizens who desire to see the Post Office Department taken out of politics and placed on a business basis ought to favor the changes above suggested. In addition to the increased efficiency of the department, it would bring about great economies. If these changes were made, it would be possible to reduce the salaries of most of the postmasters. masters themselves, if placed upon the suggested tenure of office, with the possibilities of promotion and advancement, would be perfectly willing to have material reductions made in their salaries. From a computation which I have made I am satisfied that in this item alone there would be an annual reduction of nearly $1,000,000. There are many other economies and improvements that will suggest themselves to any man who will give the question thought and consideration. It would not be long before many improvements could be put into operation in the department-among which would undoubtedly soon come 1-cent postage.

"This plan will be opposed by every political boss and by every political machine in the country. They will not make an open fight against it, because there is no argument in favor of the present system that will stand a critical analysis in the open light of publicity. The opposition to it will be secret and covered. The special interests that want to dominate the political parties and through them the Government, by the operation of political machines and the coercion of secret caucuses, will do everything possible to oppose this needed reform. The placing of the Post Office Department upon a business basis and taking it out of politics would deprive these forces of more political patronage than any other one step that could be taken. Patronage is the principal asset of the political boss, and without it the political machine can not survive. All honest, patriotic citizens ought to do everything that they can to crystallize public sentiment, which is after all the most powerful factor in legislation, to bring about this change, and place this great department of our National Government upon an economical business basis."

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record speeches delivered by Gov. Woodrow Wilson, in Washington, January 8, and in New York, April 13 and January 3, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speeches referred to are as follows:

GOV. WOODROW WILSON'S SPEECH AT JACKSON DAY DINNER, WASHINGTON, JANUARY 8, 1912.

"Mr. Toastmaster and fellow Democrats, we are met to celebrate an achievement. It is an interesting circumstance that principles have no anniversaries. Only the men who embody principles are celebrated upon occasions like this and only the events to which their concerted action gave rise excite our enthusiasm. You know that the principles of the Democratic Party are professed by practically the whole population of the United States. The test of a Democrat is whether he lives up to those principles or not. I have no doubt there are some people in the United States who covertly question the doctrines of Democracy, but nobody challenges them openly. It goes without saying, therefore, that we have not come together merely to state the abstract principles of our party. We have come together to take counsel as to how it is possible, by courageous and concerted action, to translate them into policy and law. The Democratic Party has had a long period of disappointment and defeat and I think that we can point out the We do not live in simple times. We live in very conflicting times indeed. No man can be certain that he can say how to weave the threads of Democratic principle throughout all the complicated garment of our civilization, and the reason that the Democratic Party has had this period of successive disturbance is that it has been divided into groups just as it was as to the method of fulfilling the principles.

"We have differed as to measures; it has taken us 16 years and more to come to any comprehension of our community of thought in regard to what we ought to do. What I want to say is that one of the most striking things in recent years is that with all the rise and fall of particular ideas, with all the ebb and flow of particular proposals, there has been one interesting fixed point in the history of the Democratic Party, and that fixed point has been the character and the devotion and the preachings of William Jennings Bryan.

"I, for my part, never want to forget this: That while we have differed with Mr. Bryan upon this occasion and upon that in regard to the specific things to be done, he has gone serenely on pointing out to a more and more convinced people what it was that was the matter. He has had the steadfast vision all along of what it was that was the matter and he has, not any more than Andrew Jackson did, not based his career upon calculation, but has based it upon principle.

"Now, what has been the matter? The matter has been that the Government of this country was privately controlled and that the business of this country was privately controlled; that we did not have genuine representative government and that the people of this country did not have the control of their own

"What do we stand for here to-night and what shall we stand for as long as we live? We stand for setting the Government of this country free and the business of this country free. The facts have been disputed by a good many sections of the Democratic Party for the last half generation, but they were not clearly recognized.

"I make the assertion that the Government was privately controlled. I mean to put it specifically that the Government of this country was managed by politicians who gained the con-tributions which they used by solicitation from particular groups of business interests, on the understanding, explicit or implied, that the first care of the Government was to be for those particular interests. I am not questioning either the integrity or patriotism of the men concerned. I have no right to. In most instances they were of that old belief, cropping up again and again in America, that the people of this country are not capable of perceiving their own interest and of man-aging their own affairs; that they have not the contact with large affairs; that they have not the variety of experience which qualifies them to take charge of their own affairs. It is the old Hamiltonian doctrine that those who have the biggest asset in the Government should be the trustees for the rest of us; that the men who conduct the biggest business transactions are the only men who should stand upon an elevation sufficient to see the whole range of our affairs, and that if we will but follow their leadership we may share in their prosperity. That is the Republican doctrine, and I am perfectly willing, as a tribute to their honesty though not to their intelligence, to admit that they really believe it; that they really believe it is unsafe to trust such delicate matters as the complicated business of this country to the general judgment of the country. They believe only a very small coterie of gentlemen are to be trusted with the conduct of large affairs. There was a long period in New Jersey, for example, in which no commissioner of insurance was ever chosen without first consulting or getting the consent of the head of the largest insurance company in the State, and I am willing to admit, at any rate for the sake of argument, that it was supposed he, better than anyone else, knew who was qualified for the job. He did know who was qualified for the job and he had the proper point of view in demonstrating that it was mainly for the benefit of the big interests.

"Now, the other thing that has been privately controlled in this country is the business of the country. I do not mean that each man's particular business ought not to be privately controlled, but I mean that the great business transactions of this country are privately controlled by gentlemen whom I can name and whom I will name, if it is desired; men of great dignity of character; men, as I believe, of great purity of purpose, but men who have concentrated, in their own hands, transactions which they are not willing to have the rest of the country interfere with.

"Now, the real difficulty in the United States, gentlemen, it seems to me, is not the existence of great individual combinations—that is dangerous cnough in all countries—but the real danger is the combination of the combinations, the real danger is that the same groups of men control chains of banks, systems of railways, whole manufacturing enterprises, great mining projects, great enterprises for the developing of the natural water power of this country, and that threaded together in the personnel of a series of boards of directors is a community of interest more formidable than any conceivable combination in the United States.

"It has been said that you can not 'unscramble eggs,' and I am perfectly willing to admit it, but I can see in all cases before they are scrambled that they are not put in the same basket and intrusted to the same groups of persons.

"What we have got to do—and it is a colossal task—a task not to be undertaken with a light head or without judgment—but what we have got to do is to disentangle this colossal community of interest. No matter how we may purpose dealing with a single combination in restraint of trade, you will agree with me in this that I think no combination is big enough for the United States to be afraid of; and when all the combinations are combined and this combination is not disclosed by any process of incorporation or law, but is merely the identity of personnel, then there is something for the law to pull apart, and gently, but firmly and persistently dissect.

"You know that the chemist distinguishes between a chemical combination and an amalgam. A chemical combination has done something which I can not scientifically describe, but its molecules have become intimate with one another and practically united, whereas an amalgam has a mere physical union created by pressure from without. Now, you can destroy that mere physical contact without hurting the individual elements, and you can break up this community of interest without hurting any one of the single interests combined; not that I am particularly delicate of some of the interests combined—I am not under bonds to be unusually polite, but I am interested in the business of this country, and believe its integrity depends upon this dissection. I do not believe any one group of men has vision enough or genius enough to determine what the development of opportunity and the accomplishments by achievement shall be in this country. You can not establish competition by law, but you can take away the obstacles by law that stand in the way of competition, and while we may despair of setting up competition among individual persons there is good ground for setting up competition between these great combinations, and after we have got them competing with one another they will come to their senses in so many respects that we can afterwards hold conference with them without losing our selfrespect.

"Now, that is the job. That is the thing that exists, and the thing that has to be changed, not in any spirit of revolution and not with the thought—for it would be a deeply unjust thought—that the business men of this country have put up any job on the Government of this country. Take even that colossal job known as the Payne-Aldrich tariff. The business men of this country did not put up that job. Some of the business men of this country did, but by no means all of them. Think what that means. Do you mean to say that the commercial men of this country are interested in maintaining the integrity of that bill? Some, and only some, of the*manufacturers of this country have put up that job on us, and many of them have been the unwilling beneficiaries of a system which they knew did not minister to the prosperity of their undertakings.

"I am not going to make a tariff speech. It is so easy to knock holes in the present tariff there is no sport in it. I am a humane man. I would not jump on a thing like that, but I do want to point out to you that the ownership of Governmentit is a harsh word to use, but I am not using it harshly, I am using it for shorthand—the ownership of the Government of the United States, by special groups of interests, centers in the tariff, and that is where the difference comes in. men say that politicians interfered too much with business. I want to say that business men interfere too much with politics. Do the statesmen of this country go to the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee and beg for these favors? You know that they do not. Some Congressmen go to these committees and plead that some gentlemen back in their constituencies are pressing them hard on bills, and as public men, plead for individual interests, and their entrance into politics has been so by those who intended to control the schedules of the tariff.

"I once heard a very distinguished Member of Congress give this illustration: He was talking about a great campaign fund that had been collected. It was the paltry sum of $400,000. It was a great sum for that somewhat primitive day, and it was pointed out at the time—at any rate specified—that most of this money had been contributed by manufacturers who were the chief beneficiaries of the tariff, and those gentlemen pointed out that they certainly would want to get their money back.

I may not be saying the thing properly, but it is simply this:

"Down where I live we get most of our water from pumps, and a pump, as you know, may go dry over night, and a prudent housekeeper will pump up a bucket of water at night before she goes to bed and leave it standing. Then, in the morning if the plunger will not suck she pours in that water, and that expands the plunger and it begins sending the pump water out; and the first water that comes out is the same water she poured in. By that I mean, gentlemen, that this $400,000 was ordered poured in to make the old pump suck, and you know that that homely illustration is fair. That is what is done and that is way the control of Government comes in.

"Well, what are we going to do? I have a practical mind, and am not interested particularly in the too-long-winded discussion of the principles upon which we are going to act. Neither am I wise enough to propose a comprehensive program. I think the rule of Donnybrook Fair is good enough for me: 'Hit the heads you see.' Make sure before that your shillalahs are made of good Irish hickory. By that I mean this: Lop off the special favors whenever you are certain you have identified them; lop them off. That is a pretty good rule. You do not need to be all-wise to do that. Paint some of those favors so conspicuously that all can see them. If you do not know which they are, ask the first man you meet on the street and he will they are, ask the first man you meet out the street and he want tell you. He will give you a list that will keep you busy all winter. And I might add this, if you please, not to go at them haphazard, but to go steadily through the things that have become obvious excrescences and cut them off. That is a very definite program, and, then, I might add, go into an absolutely thorough investigation of the way it may best be conducted, find out just where, in dissecting, the scalpel can be introduced, and divorce these artificial unions, because I know that you will not be cutting living tissue.

"I hear a great deal of talk about conservatism and radical-Now, what makes a man shiver when he hears a statement of the facts concerning it? He feels it is cold-blooded and indiscreet to state the facts, and yet he really is inclined, I must say, to think there is something in it. He says to himself, this man must be a radical, because if he sees the thing that way, what in God's name is he going to do, because, if he is going to go to work to thoroughly change those facts there is no telling where he will stop. Now, it is just there that he ought to stop being radical. If the prudent surgeon wants to save the patient he has got absolutely to know the naked anatomy of the man. He has got to know what is under his skin and in his intestines; he has got to be absolutely indecent in his scrutiny. And then he has got to say to himself: 'I know where the seat of life is; I know, where my knife should penetrate; I dare not go too far for fear it should touch the fountain of vitality. In order to save this beautiful thing I must cut deep, but I must cut carefully; I must cut out the things that are decayed and rotten, the things that manifest disease, and I must leave every honest, wholesome tissue absolutely untouched.' A capital operation may be radical, but it is also conservative. There can not be life without the cutting out of the dead and decayed tissue.

And, as to business, after a few committees like the Stanley committee have gone on a little longer we will know a good many particulars, and we will be versed in this high-finance business ourselves. These things are coming out with astonishing candor. We now know how to regulate prices. We know how to run combinations by circulars that convey intimations and instructions. We see the little artificial threads that bind these things together, threads which do not themselves contain the life, but which themselves do control the vessels in which the life blood runs. And so stage by stage we shall learn what the practical business of a Democrat is. It is to go to the root of the matter, seek out the processes of cure and restoration and rehabilitation. What a travesty it is upon the name of Democracy to see any Democrat who wishes to destroy the very thing that his principles should make him in love with, rery thing that his principles should have him in love with, namely, the life of the people themselves. A very thoughtful preacher pointed out the other day that one of the first quotations in our Lord's Prayer is, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' which would seem, perhaps, to indicate that our Lord bread, what overy statement must know that the spiritual life knew what every statesman must know that the spiritual life of the Nation can not exist unless it has physical life; that you can not be an altruist and patriot on an empty stomach. Nothing shows the utter incapacity of a man to be a Democrat so much as his incapacity to understand what we are after. He does not know that the very seeds of life are in the principles and confidence and lives and virtues of the people of this country, and so when we strike at the trusts, or, rather, I will not say strike at the trusts, because we are not slashing about us-when we move against the trusts, when we undertake the strategy which is going to be necessary to overcome and destroy monopoly, we are rescuing the business of this country, we are not injuring it, and when we separate the interests from each other and disconnect these communities of connection we have in mind a greater community of interest, a vaster com-munity of interest, the community of interest that binds the virtues of all men together, that mankind which is broad and catholic enough to take under the sweep of its comprehension all sorts and conditions of men, and that vision which sees that no society is renewed from the top and every society is renewed from the bottom. Limit opportunity, restrict the field of originative achievement, and you have cut out the heart and root of the prosperity of the country itself.

"The only thing that can ever make a free country is to keep a free and hopeful heart under every jacket in it, and then there will be an irrepressible vitality, then there will be an irrepressible ideal which will enable us to be Democrats of the sort that when we die we shall look back and say: 'Yes; from time to time we differed with each other as to what ought to be done, but, after all, we followed the same vision, after all we worked slowly, stumbling through dark and doubtful passages onward to a common purpose and a common ideal.' Let us apologize to each other that we ever suspected or antagonized one another; let us join hands once more all around the great circle of community of counsel and of interest which will show us at the last to have been indeed the friends of our country and the friends of mankind."

ADDRESS OF GOV. WILSON AT THE JEFFERSON DAY BANQUET, WALDORF-ASTORIA, APRIL 13, 1912.

"Gov. Wilson spoke to the toast, 'What Jefferson Would Do.' He said in part:

"'The circumstances of our day are so utterly different from those of Jefferson's day that it may seem nothing less than an act of temerity to attempt to say what Jefferson would do if he were now alive and guiding us with his vision and command. The world we live in is no longer divided into neighborhoods and communities; the lines of the telegraph thread it like nerves uniting a single organism. The ends of the earth touch one another and exchange impulse and purpose, America has swung out of her one-time isolation and has joined the family of nations. She is linked to mankind by every tie of blood and circumstance. She is more cosmopolitan in her make-up than any other nation of the world; is enriched by a greater variety of energy drawn from strong peoples the world over. She is not the simple, homogeneous, rural nation that she was in Jefferson's time, making only a beginning at development and the conquest of fortune; she is great and strong; above all she is infinitely varied; her affairs are shot through with emotion and the passion that comes with strength and growth and selfconfidence. We live in a new and strange age and reckon with new affairs alike in economics and politics of which Jefferson knew nothing.
"'And yet we may remind ourselves that Jefferson's mind did not move in a world of narrow circumstances; it did not confine itself to the conditions of a single race or a single con-It had commerce with the thought of men old and new; it had moved in an age of ample air, in which men thought not only of nations but of mankind, in which they saw not only individual policies, but a great field of human need and of human fortune. Neither did he think in abstract terms, as did the men with whom he had had such stimulating commerce of thought in France. His thought was not speculation; it was the large generalization that comes from actual observation and experience. He had had contact with plain men of many kinds. as well as with philosophers and foreign statesmen. He thought in a way that his neighbors in Virginia could understand, in a way which illuminated their own lives and ambitions for them. And though he was deemed a philosopher, he was nevertheless the idol of the people, for he somehow heard and voiced what they themselves could have said and purposed and conceived. For all the largeness of his thought, it was bathed in an everyday atmosphere; it belongs to the actual, workaday world; it has its feet firmly on circumstances and fact and the footing all men are accustomed to who reflect at all on their lives and the lives of their neighbors and compatriots. He was holding up for the illumination of the things of which he spoke a light which he had received out of the hands of old philosophers. But the rays of that light as he held it fell upon actual American life: they did not lose themselves vaguely in space; they were for the guidance of men's feet every day.

We may be sure, therefore, that had Jefferson lived in our time he would have acted upon the facts as they are. In the first place, because he would have seen them as they actually are, and in the second place because he would have been interested in theory only as he could adjust it to the reality of the life about him. He would not have been content with a philosophy which he could fit together only within the walls of his study. "'To determine what Jefferson would have done, therefore, requires only that we should ourselves clearly see the facts of our time as they are, whether in the field of government or in the field of our economic life, and that we should see how Jefferson's principle of the rule and authority of the people stands related to those facts. We are constantly quoting Jefferson's fundamental thought: it was that no policy could last whose foundation is narrow, based upon the privileges and authority of a few, but that its foundations must be as broad as the interests of all the men and families and neighborhoods that live under it. Monopoly, private control, the authority of privilege, the concealed mastery of a few men cunning enough to rule without showing their power-he would have at once announced them rank weeds which were sure to choke out all wholesome life in the fair garden of affairs. If we can detect these things in our time; if we can see them and describe them and touch them as they are, then we know what Jefferson would have done. He would have moved against them, sometimes directly, sometimes indirectly, sometimes openly, sometimes subtly; but whether he merely mined about them or struck directly at them, he would have set systematic war against them at the front of all his purpose.

"'As regards the real influences that control our Government, he would have asked first of all: Are they determined by the direct and open contacts of opinion? He would have found that they were not; that, on the contrary, our Government as it has developed has supplied secret influences with a hundred coverts and ambushes; that the opinion of the Nation makes little noise in the committee rooms of legislatures; that it is certain large, special interests and not the people who maintain the lobby; that the argument of the lobby is oftentimes louder and more potent than the argument of the hustings and the floor of the representative body. He would have found, moreover, that until very recent years opinion had had very difficult access, if any at all, in most seasons, of the private conferences in which candidates for office were chosen, candidates for both administrative and legislative office, and that in the private conferences where it was determined who should be nominated and, therefore, of course, who should be elected, the same influences had established themselves which ruled in the legislative lobby. That money, the money that kept the whole organization together, flowed in, not from the general body of the people, but from those who wished to determine in their own private interest what governors and legislators should and should not do.

"'It is plain, in such circumstances, what he would have insisted, as we are insisting now, that if there could be found no means by which the authority and purpose of the people could break into these private places and establish their rule again, if the jungle proved too thick for the common thought to ex plore, if the coverts where the real power lurked were too difficult to find, the forces of genuine democracy must move around them instead of through them, must surround and beleaguer them, must establish a force outside of them by which they can be dominated or overawed. It is with the discussion of just such affairs that the public mind is now preoccupied and engrossed. Debate is busy with them from one end of the land to the other.

"'As regards the economic policy of the country it is perfectly plain that Mr. Jefferson would have insisted upon a tariff fitted to actual conditions, by which he would have meant not the interests of the few men who find access to the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, but the interests of the business men and manufacturers and farmers and workers and professional men of every kind and class. He would have insisted that the schedules should be turned wrong side out and every item of their contents subjected to the general scrutiny of all concerned. It is plain, also, that he would have insisted upon a currency system elastic, indeed, and suited to the varying circumstances of the money market in a great industrial and trading Nation, but absolutely fortified and secured against a central control, the influence of coteries, and leagues of banks to which it is now in constant danger of being subjected. He would have known that the currency question is not only an economic question but a political question, and that, above all things else, control must be in the hands of those who represent the general interest and not in the hands of those who represent the things we are seeking to guard against.

"'In the general field of business his thought would, of course, have gone about to establish freedom, to throw business opportunity open at every point to new men, to destroy the processes of monopoly, to exclude the poison of special favors, to see that, whether big or little, business was not dominated by anything but the law itself, and that that law was made in the interest of plain, unprivileged men everywhere.

"' Jefferson's principles are sources of light because they are not made up of pure reason, but spring out of aspiration, impulse, vision, sympathy. They burn with the fervor of the heart; they wear the light of interpretation he sought to speak gree voice the purposes you have formed. If I do so, it will in, the authentic terms of honest, human ambition. And the law in his mind was the guardian of all legitimate ambition. It was the great umpire standing by to see that the game was honorably and fairly played in the spirit of generous rivalry and open the field free to every sportsmanlike contestant.

"'Constitutions are not inventions. They do not create our liberty. They are rooted in life, in fact, in circumstance, in environment. They are not the condition of our liberty but its expression. They result from our life; they do not create it.

And so there beats in them always, if they live at all, this pulse of the large life of humanity. As they yield and answer to that they are perfected and exalted.

"'Indeed, the whole spirit of government is the spirit of men of every kind banded together in a generous combination seeking the common good. Nations are exalted, parties are made great as they partake of this aspiration and are permitted to see this vision of the Nation as a whole struggling toward a common ideal and a common hope.

"'We as Democrats are particularly bound at this season of expectation and of confidence to remember that it is only in this spirit and with this vision that we can ever serve either the Nation or ourselves. As we approach the time when we are to pick out a President-for I believe that is to be our privilegewe should fix our thought on this one great fact, that no man is big enough or great enough to be President alone. He will be no stronger than his party. His strength will lie in the counsel of his comrades. His success will spring out of the union and energy and unselfish cooperation of his party, and his party must be more than half the Nation. It must include, and genuinely include, men of every class and race and disposition. If he be indeed the representative of his people, there may be vouchsafed to him through them something of the vision to conceive what Jefferson conceived and understood—how the vision may be carried into reality."

THE TARIFF.

ADDRESS BY GOV. WOODROW WILSON AT THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CLUB, NEW YORK, JANUARY 3, 1912.

"Mr. President and members of the National Democratic Club: It is with real pleasure that I find myself here again and realize as I look about me that these are familiar surroundings, for it has always been with unfailing cordinity that you have welcomed me, and I have always had the feeling that this was a place where it was worth while to say something, if one had anything to say.

"I want to begin by congratulating the club upon the program of action which it has formed under the leadership of its intelligent officers. It is very delightful that a club should see at the outset of a campaign just the most effectual way of conducting that campaign. A campaign can be conducted only by the intelligent and earnest cooperation of men. There is a singular difference, into the psychology of which I will not try to enter, between a campaign for tariff reform initiated by a professedly reform society and a campaign for tariff reform initiated by a professedly political association, for a political organization is known to exist in order to transact business. It does not exist merely for the purpose of discussing abstract ideas. You realize that when a club like this argues about tariff reform, that is the basis of a constructive program, not merely the basis of exposition. You are not merely going to send lecturers around the country, but are going to debate the affairs of the Nation with the idea of getting a sufficient number of fellow citizens to stand with you; for, in spite of what some gentlemen have stated to the contrary, I am absolutely in favor of organization, but it depends upon what the organization is for. It depends upon how the organization is controlled. organization is privately owned, then I am not for it, because I don't propose being owned myself; but if the organization is intended for the cooperation of men of like minds, in order to accomplish a common purpose and to advance the fortunes of a party which means to serve the Nation, then I am for it. judge an organization by the way in which it is controlled and the objects to which it devotes itself. If it devotes itself to public objects, then every man must believe in it; if it does not, then honest men must withdraw from it-and so I congratulate you upon having the true spirit of organization-an organization which is not meant merely to associate yourselves together, but to associate yourselves together for a common purpose, a national purpose, a purpose which has for its object legislation to affect the conditions of the whole country. There is something that stirs the red blood in a man when a program

"I deem it an honor, therefore, to be associated with such men at the beginning of this campaign; and to have been asked to speak first, is a particular honor, as if I could in some debe simply because I have had a lifelong conviction that a very great degree of wrong has been done this country by the way in which the policy of protection has been applied to its I am not going into a general discussion of the theory of protection, because, according to a very classical phrase, it is not a theory but a condition which confronts us; a condition of the country; a condition of affairs; an organization of our economic system to our business system which has risen out of a special policy; a special set of circumstances. One of the peculiarities of the tariff question is that it never seems to be settled; it is constantly recurrent, and there must be something very subtle to anybody who has studied history, in coming upon our old familiar friend in this question which has come up in every generation, to vex and perplex the American Nation again and again and again. You know it is one of the complaints of our business men that it is never settled; that Congress will not let it alone; will never let business live on any fixed schedule of duties. Now, that is generally said to be true, because there is an uneasy set of persons called politicians who must have some means by which to stir up trouble and create unfavorable opinion. The first thing I want to call to your attention-a thing that has caused a great deal of discussion up to the present time—is this: It is not the politicians who have started this business. If you want to take business out of politics, business ought voluntarily to get out of politics. The reason business is in politics now is that it has thrust itself in by going upon every occasion to Washington and insisting upon getting all that it can get from Congress. Politicians have not put the question of the tariff into politics. Business men have put the question of the tariff into politics, and there have been circumstances and situations in our politics of which they were all aware even when they could not be proven. At least one great party was going to control the business interests for fear the things they demanded of their politicians could not be got. Why has the Republican Party habitually been associated with the policy of high tariffs? Because the Republican Party consisted of a number of gentlemen of a practical turn of mind who could prove to you the economic necessity of the tariff? Not at all, but because the bills of the Republican Party were paid by business men who wanted a high tariff. Now, suppose we put the shoe on the other foot and invite the gentlemen who want business let alone to let politics alone. I for my part agree to withdraw from troubling business if business will withdraw from troubling polities. I want to know who first steps in and troubles the waters of the pool? We don't go in first, we are chased out of the pool; we are not allowed to get in first. And so I want to shift the burden of responsibility at the very beginning. it the politicians who rush to the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee when this question is going to be touched? Not at all. It is the gentlemen who want the tariff schedules arranged according to their interests who later state 'it is just like you politicians, you never let business alone.' I am not jesting; this is the true state of affairs, and I suggest a little reciprocity in 'letting alone.' I suggest that somebody else take the medicine they try to administer to us. Are they ready to make the bargain? They are not ready to make the bargain? They are not ready to make the bargain yet. They say, 'We don't want the trouble of having to fix this up every time with the Ways and Means Committee. It worries us. We can not calculate on to-morrow, because we do not know who are going to be members of the Ways and Means Committee. We do not know when it will happen that some men may get on that committee who know we are hampering them, and when that happens the game is going to get awk-

"Now, having shifted the responsibility, we are going to discuss the tariff question. We are to discuss it with the purpose of taking the tariff question out of politics. The only way to settle it is for the good of the country and not for the good of anybody in particular. Link it with special interests; let special interests have the chief interest in it, and you can not settle it and take it out of politics. But once apply the rule of general interest and you have taken it out of politics. The minute you make it a tariff for revenue you have taken it out of politics. Then you have got something to stand on. I am not saying that you must do this thing offhand without considering all the vested interests that have been built up. That is a different proposition. How you are going to do it is a different question. I am now discussing the idea you must hold in view when undertaking it. Well, then, let us realize that there is another reason we are taking up the tariff question again. The tariff question is not now what it was a generation ago. It is not the same question. We are not agitating the old question. We are taking up a question old in one sense, but which must be dealt with under circumstances so radically different that it is now a different question. There was a

greatest success. They said:

"It does not matter how high a tariff wall you build around the country, because here is a great continent, with almost inexhaustible resources, in which initiative will build up a great many enterprises of a great many kinds and a great many enterprises of the same kind and prices will be kept down by competition. One of the things the people do not realize is that we have exhibited one of the biggest experiments in business that has ever been set up. There was once free trade within the whole area of this great country, free trade between innumerable competitors, and it was reasonable to expect then, as the earlier advocates of protection did expect, as great men later constantly believed it was reasonable to expect, that prices would be kept down by internal competition. But I don't have to argue with you. Prices are not kept down by internal competition, I don't have to point out to you gentlemen, noticing that the tariff wall was kept high and there was a snug covering behind it, that the beneficiaries consulted with one another and said, 'Now, is it really necessary that we should cut one another and said, 'Now, is it really necessary that we should cut one another's throats?' These gentlemen in Washington will build this wall as high as we want it built. Let's get together. If the law is too watchful, let us have an understanding. We are men of honor. We will keep our word of honor. We can form an arrangement by which we can determine, to a very considerable extent at any rate, the price of the raw material. We can, if we will, control the sources of the raw materials by means ad libitum. We can hup mines we do not intend to use for a generation and keep them in our side pockets, and so we can cut out any automatic regulation of this kind, instead of having a price schedule that is not our own and in open competition with the market."

"Don't you realize, in short, that the great combinations of modern business have made the old theory of protection absolutely antiquated? It is a prepesterous theory. It is very beautiful as theory, but it doesn't work. If it worked, I would have some respect for it, but it is moribund. It has forgot how to work. It is stiff in the joints. And so I say we are not arguing with those who were not revered when alive, but, having died, are very much revered. You know Dean Swift's cynical translation of the old latin, 'When scoundrels die let all bemoan them.' There is a great pity that encaseth the dead, but even the dead, if they were to come back to life, would not say that the theory of protection is what it was once. It has lost all signs of vitality and youth.

"Then there is another circumstance." once in a process of development which has peculiarly to an end. When Mr. REDFIELD came in this evening, the first thing I said to him was that I would not be here if I hadn't looked at his speeches. I primed myself on Mr. Redfield's If he recognizes these points, he must forgive me. I really thought of some of them myself. I leave it to him to pick out which is his. But one of the things which has impressed me jibes in with what I have often thought about the sharp turning point that occurred in the year 1898, after the Spanish War. This marks the end of an epoch for America. It marks the end of a domestic epoch. After the Spanish War was over we joined the company of nations for the first timeat least for the first time since the very beginning, when we were very, very young—a child of the nations, having re-cently been the colony of a great trading nation. Without wealth we had many other things—a merchant marine, which we have carefully destroyed. Our flag, though a new flag, was on many seas. Our carrying trade was that of a nation young in its nationality, from whose coasts came men who could invade the seas, who could build any kind of craft, who knew the trading laws and trading ports of the round globe. But we invited this generation to forget all this and said, 'We are going to shut ourselves in until we have formed this garden of our own.' We have developed that, and an interesting thing has happened, and if I am right in my facts the dealers in grain tell me that we are reaching the point when we won't export grain, when we will need practically all the grain for our own consumption, and some men may live to see that day unless we do something for our farms. Now, the consequence is we will have no surplus grain to supply the world with at the time we reach the stage where we have a great deal of surplus manufactured product, and the whole thing has turned up by reason of this extraordinary condition.

"Do you realize the extent of the audacity of the men who created the protective system? They said, 'We are going to see to it that nothing is done for the farmers'—who at that time were producing the wealth of the Nation—'and that everything is done for the men who have not yet produced any wealth at all,' and by this process of favoritism and subsidizing of one kind or another, direct or indirect, we have altered the natural plans of life in this country.

"How does it happen that when immigrants come to this country from agricultural regions they do not go to the farms, but are caught in the meshes of our cities? For the same reason that the boys of the plow of our country have been turned away from the farms and into the factories. All the lifeblood of the country is being drained from the farms into the factories. A great many of the morbid conditions of our society are due to this same excessive fostering of one side of national life at the expense of the other. The alterations and economic balance of our life, the artificial stimulation, have destroyed that poise and balance which have been created by this protective policy. And now see what a point we have reached. We have stimulated it so much that we have not a large enough market or the means of disposing of the surplus This Nation calls itself a trading Nation, and has the knowledge of other manufacturing nations as to foreign markets, but whenever you have to ship any goods you have to ship them under some other flag than the flag of the United States. How did it happen that we destroyed our own mer-chant marine and were associated with the policy by which we taxed the stuff out of which ships were built? We could not build them, and so, as if by deliberation, we deprived our-selves of the carrying trade of the world, which, if we had kept on our original plan, we might have had almost to the exclusion of other nations. It is a very rare treat, and possibly more delightful because it is so rare, in foreign waters, to see the Stars and Stripes on a great ship. I never realized what the Stars and Stripes meant to me emotionally until one day in Plymouth Harbor I saw a ship sweep past me with the Stars and Stripes at her gaff. It was an exceptionally rare sight, and I have never seen it since. I will remember that flag to my dying day. It was a rare specimen, an isolated testimonial to the spirit of a great national policy. And now we are getting very much interested in foreign markets, but the foreign markets are not particularly in-We have not been very polite, we have not enterested in us. couraged the intercourse with foreign markets that we might have encouraged, and have obstructed the influence of foreign competition. So these circumstances make the tariff question a new question, our internal arrangements and new combinations of business on one side and on the other our external necessities and the need to give scope to our energy which is now pent up and confined within our own borders; and yet the standpat Republican leaders remain unenlightened, uninformed, absolutely blind and stubborn. They don't know anything has happened. I wish I remembered some nonsense rhymes I once knew, the only nonsense I ever talked. I would apply them to these gentlemen who talk in the same phrases that were used 30, 40, and 50 years ago; who quote the eminent statesmen of those days, supposing they are talking about the same things then talked about, whereas they can not find those things anywhere within their range. Now, one of the things they say is that they are the guardians of prosperity, and that nothing but the protective system can bring us prosperity, and when you press them to define prosperity they will define it in terms of the bulk of busi-One of their most delightful expositions of patriotic purpose is we must have new industries—if we have not got them we must acquire them at any cost. Prof. Taussig calls attention to the fact that in the debate in the Senate on the Aldrich bill Mr. Aldrich said, in defense of a duty of 50 per cent on some article, that he was just as willing to pay 300, 400, or 500 per cent, provided he could thereby bring that industry to this country. Mr. Aldrich's idea of prosperity is to get as many industries as possible established in this country at any price. Who pays the price, I would like to know? The consumer, of course; but, rather, the price is distributed in the readjustments of the whole economic system. It is impossible to find who pays it. If you could, you might make him mad. But the trouble is you can not convince anybody in particular that they are paying But we, let us say in general terms, we are paying 50, 100, 200, or 300 per cent in order that some gentlemen may set up and make a profit in some business that ought not to be set up in America, because America does not offer the ideal conditions. And that is prosperity! I understand prosperity to be the abundant, intelligent, economic development of resources possessed by the country itself. That is prosperity. It is using the plow, engines, mills, and water powers of this country just as you would use your own intellectual and physical resources. My prosperity consists in the best possible development of my powers. It does not consist in my loading my back with borrowed plumage that I have to pay something for and wear with an unaccustomed awkwardness. That is not prosperity. And by the same token they say you are making business, therefore you are making employment, and we must assume-we must still assume—that the American workingman is so ignorant, so unintelligent, as to suppose they are doing it for his sake. I'd like to know how he ever got into the game. I'd like to know how many gentlemen voluntarily share the profits of production with their workingmen. I know how the workingmen got their share—they got it by saying that they would not work until they did. That's the way they ever got it. They tell you, gentlemen, that you cut up the pie very well; but we are not The men under 40 years of age can take care of themselves, and going to supply the pie any more unless we have a piece of it. And I don't blame them. It's a grab game, anyhow. That's exactly what the manufacturers were doing—going down to Washington and saying, 'If you don't give us these things, who is going to pay the campaign expenses this year?' They were on strike; they were combined on strike. Now, it was only treating them with their own medicine when their workingmen said, 'We, too, can play at that game. We are on strike. How much are we going to get?' And the only reason they did not get it is they did not have the resources to stay out. That's the reason the heart of America really sympathizes with the combinations of labor; that's the only way they are going to prosper in what is a selfish game.

"Now, what is really the source of wages? Here I want to say explicitly that I sit at the feet of men like Mr. Redfield, say explicitly that I sit at the feet of men like Mr. Redfield, who pay wages, who have handled the matter, and who know what they are talking about. Though the political economists say the same things, they don't say them in the terms of specific instance the way these gentlemen say them. Wages come from the intelligence and energy of the workingmen, made effective by the presence of natural resources and their management by efficient managers. That's where wages come from. For example, we talk about American laborers competing with the pauper labor of Europe. I heard that only last night, and I thought I was in a dream. It sounded medieval. Haven't you known a machine that cost $500 to compete successfully with a machine that cost $50? That did the same work? Haven't you known instances where it was profitable, economically profitable, to pay $500 rather than $50 for a machine, because the machine did so much more and better work that the $500 machine was cheaper than the $50 machine? Isn't that true? Do we protect expensive American machinery against European pauper ma-What do Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans-not Germans, now, because they have put their unmatched studiousness onto this job-but what do Englishmen in some continental countries do? They send for Americans as experts to tell them how they can make more out of their industrial plants, and what they are told in almost every instance is that they will have to get American machinery; and that means that they have to put their pauper machinery on the junk heap. the analogy perfect? I don't see any fault in it. If the ported American machines and American laborers they would also have to import the superintendents who know how to organize labor. The high cost of production is, almost in every instance, due not to high wages but to the loss and waste in respect of bad management, poor machinery, or locating your whole plant in such a way that it is not in proximity to railroads and the other things necessary to the markets of the country. If you put your factory in in the right way, organize it right, put right machinery in, and then get the highest priced labor, you will find that you will make your profits, because in proportion as you improve the economic efficiency of your business your profits will be greater. You need more intelligent laborers, and you can not get them except at a higher price. To my mind that's rudimentary, but there are gentlemen who have never heard of it. There are manufac-turers upon whom that idea has never dawned, and they may not believe it. I give their intelligence the benefit of the doubt. They will tell you that the American manufacturer has to be protected because he has to pay his laborers so much, and they will tell the laborer that protection is going to increase his wages; and now the laborer is finding out that they do not increase his wages and that there is something the matter with the working of the machinery.

"That leads me to the most beautiful theory of all—the theory of the cost of production. It took the Republican Party a long time to be absolutely frank in disclosing their ignorance of political economy. They were not perfectly frank until the last campaign, and then they said they wanted to proportion protection—proportion the rate of duty to the difference in the cost of production between American factories and the factories with which they had come into competition abroad. I wonder if those gentlemen wrote that plank with a straight face? I don't see how it was possible unless they employed some one who didn't know anything about it. The difference between whom? You say between the foreign manufacturer and the domestic manufacturer. Which foreign manufacturer and which domestic manufacturer? Where is your standard in the difference in Where is your standard in the difference in cost of production? Suppose you wanted to find differences that, as the Tariff Commission suggests, are average differences? An average is a variable thing. It might accidentally hit somebody, but I doubt whether it would hit many of us. If reduced it might not hit persons over 40 years of age, and if you are if you are really going to do the fatherly and generous thing you propose in the theory of protection, you will take care of the least efficient. They are the ones who need looking after. If you reduce it to an average then you leave out the most helpless of the lot—the men who don't know how to organize their business, who don't know how to use their expensive laborers, who don't know how to use or assemble their expensive machinery or utilize the markets in an intelligent fashion. They are the men toward whom I feel a considerable degree of generosity, and if I was a protectionist I would go the limit and protect the least efficient, and frankly I do not see where you are going to succeed on any other basis. If you protect the least efficient you are going to protect absolutely everybody, and you have reached the ultimate goal of that kind of government-a government that is taking care of everybody and everybody is assured a reasonable profit. Is not that a very reductio ad absurdum? Otherwise, let us see. We are going to protect the most efficient who know how to do business and who use their resources when needed, to regulate it. You will protect only the trusts; that is to say, if their own account of the matter is to be accepted, because the trusts are defended by great combinations to bring about the high degree of efficiency caused by protection. I do not believe it. I believe there is a point in combination beyond which the economy is lost and there is a very great loss and waste. It is like the law of diminishing returns in agriculture. Up to a certain point an addition of fertilizers, an addition of workingmen, and additional work on the farm will bring increasing returns, but you reach a limit where you have got too much fertilizer on it and too many men. Then your returns begin to diminish, and there is the same law in industrial combinations. Then let us see: We are going to take those industrial combinations which have reached that highest point of efficiency and protect only them. They are the only fellows who can afford to sell any-where in the world. Why be benevolent to the self-supporting? It is like reserving your charity and conferring it only on millionaires. These are the gentlemen who know how to run the world, and do run a considerable part of it, and they are going to be protected! Turn any way you please, gentlemen, it is a will-o'-the-wisp.

"Nobody deserves more sympathy than the honest gentlemen who construe the tariff question, because they are put upon this impossible quest to find the cost of production. is not the same cost of production between any two factories unless they absolutely match each other. Then, there is not the same cost of production in the several parts of the same combination. Now you notice how the combinations meet that matter of the cost of production. Let us see: Where there are 20 mills or factories and a combination is effected they put those various properties into the combination at, let us say, a reasonable figure; that is not generally so, but we will admit it. They then put them in at the real figure of their value. I won't go on to the next step, because that is painful. They then double the whole business with a lot of manipulation, which is a delicate matter, but suppose they went no further than that and put them in at what they are really worth? Then they shut up 5 or 6 of them because, compared with the rest they are operated at a loss, and put out stocks and bonds on the face of those shut up, as well as on the basis of the other 14, and we go on paying interest on what it cost to shut those 6 up. They have eliminated those 5 or 6, but so far as the consumer is concerned they go on as ghostly mills that work while you sleep and you keep paying the price.

"Now, the Nation could just as well afford to do that as what it is doing now. I would rather have the credit of American efficiency, shut up the inefficient factories, and continue to pay out of the Public Treasury a reasonable profit. I say I would rather do that than go on letting the inefficient work and go on assuring them a reasonable profit. The newly discovered ground is quicksand, and I advise the Republican Party to move off before it disappears. They will certainly be engulfed if they stand on that theory long enough. This cost of production has no stability anywhere in it. It is a constant flux and, as Mr. Redfield has somewhere said, a disgrace to any concern if it is not a constantly changed quantity. The cost of production ought to be constantly reduced in a business that is making profit. It ought not to stand in the same place for 2 of 12 months.

Now, what is the conclusion of the whole matter? There are three conclusions. In the first place, we have been doing this thing at a tremendous economic disturbance, artificially changing our whole plans of society, and I fear we will go on doing it at an enormous waste. Has this country really husbanded and used its resources properly? Hasn't it used them in a way disgracefully wasteful? Haven't we stopped working a mine the minute it began to be difficult to work? Haven't we stopped using them the minute our native virgin properties seemed difficult to manipulate? Haven't we left scrap heaps everywhere? Haven't we left off taking care of our forests, the splendid trees, ripping and tearing everywhere we have gone? Hasn't our progress been marked by scenes of devastation? Nothing looked to, nothing saved, nothing utilized to the utmost, though we did not have to utilize it to the utmost. Government has made everybody pay this bill of wastefulness, and we have even gone to the extent of paying bills of the next generations. Don't you know the combinations bought up mines they do not intend to use while we are still alive, and we are paying the interest on what it cost them to buy those mines which the next generation is going to use? Isn't there an enormous economic waste when every generation must not alone pay its own bills, but the next generation's bills? The whole thing is an extravagant mirage of philanthropy, and this economic waste has bred in us something that is contrary to our trade genius; a sort of indulgence of looseness, a method of imperfection.

"In the second place, we have got ourselves in the habit of legislating for the few instead of for the many on an interesting theory that I am very fond of explaining:

"The theory of the Republican Party has been if a few prosper all will be given a share of their prosperity; if you make the great captains of industry rich, they will make the country It isn't so; but we have been foolish enough to believe it sometimes. We have been foolish enough to settle national elections on the belief that it was so. We believed that factories would be shut up and some thousands of poor devils sent out of employment and that symptoms of distress would be established, when there was no genuine necessity for distress at all. Oh, the greed of these men, the indulgence, the eternal indulgence of selfishness! They will say you have paid the bills for us and for our fathers, and you have got to pay them again or we will know the reason why. I don't feel any bitterness about this, gentlemen; all that is buried; but it is the fact that we should have been so put upon; that we should have been so innocent as to believe the incredible-which we could demonstrate as untrue if we only took the pains and looked into the facts-what the consumers knew to be untrue at the very time they were patiently casting Republican ballots and made believe they thought it wise; this putting the advantages of legislation in the hands of the few at the constant sacrifice of the many; and the dream of America has been reversed to a Government for the privileged few and not for the many.

"There is a quotation which we have been applauding nearly every Fourth of July, as I remember, but which we have not believed since I can remember. We have applied that quotation from the Virginia bill of rights and from one of Washington's addresses, in which he lays it down as a fundamental conception of American affairs that when the people deem their Government is not serving their interests they have a right to resume it into their own hands. Haven't you heard that before, and haven't you applied it? Well, do you believe it? America has not acted upon that it my lifetime. That belief is merely intended to be engraved in golden letters upon some tablet of our memories and enshrined as a fragrant recollection.

Now, there is another thing that this has done-and I am ashamed to see how long I have spoken-it has reversed all our natural conceptions of government. The worst feature of pro-tection is the demoralization of our political ideas. We have based government upon patronage and privilege instead of upon justice and equality. That's the cancer that eats at the hearts of all.

"Now, what are we going to do? Are we going to turn revolutionists? Are we going to act as free traders? I wish I might hope that our grandchildren could indulge in free trade, but I am afraid even they can not, because they have to pay the bills of the Federal Government. We have a Federal systhe bits of the Federal Government. We have a Federal sys-tem of government, and it is wise, it is good housekeeping, it is good management to leave direct taxes, for the most part, to the State governments, because they have current bills to pay. It is likely that for an indefinite period we shall have to pay our national bills by duties collected at the ports. Though I am not for drastic changes, yet I wish I saw some ultimate escape from it. At present I do not. Therefore, what we have to ask ourselves is not the principle upon which we are to act, for We are to act upon the fundamental principle of that is plain. the Democratic Party-not free trade, but tariff for revenueand we have got to approach that by such avenues, by such stages, and at such a pace as will be consistent with the stability and safety of the business of the country. Fortunately there are some things that are plain. The very wide-awake gentlemen who constitute the Democratic majority in the lower House of Congress saw the opening in the line and carried the ball through. They saw the schedules upon which it was safe to act, and unanimously agreed that it was safe and wise to act now, which they did; and now they may have to act again to the same effect, because all excuses, so far as I can see, for any cooperation are swept away. Many excuses were offered. The cover of the tariff bill was an excellent cover while it lasted, but the Tariff Board has uncovered the defense, and now there are certain schedules upon which our minds are fixed, with a sufficient illumination of the facts and conditions to enable us to act upon them. We can act upon them, and, feeling our way prudently here and there, not like doctrinaires, but like practical and prudent men, we can by prudent stages bring this tariff down to our children on a proper tariff basis. That's a plain program. It is a practical man's program. It is not a theoretical program; it is not a program based upon a desire to get even with anyone; it is not a program based upon patience that special privilege has exhausted; it is merely an openminded, prudent, statesmanlike course of action.

I congratulate you, gentlemen, upon undertaking this campaign of education, not of agitation; of demonstration, not of abuse; a campaign where the facts will be more eloquent than figures of speech, and where back of the whole thing will lie that natural impulse of public service upon which alone a permanent national policy can be founded."

[Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is an agreement that several other speeches are to be made to-night before the bill is read under the five-minute rule.

The Chair asked the gentleman from The CHAIRMAN. Tennessee if he desired to yield any more time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I did not hear the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings in reference to reading the bill be vacated and that general debate be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the proceedings under the five-minute rule be vacated and that general debate be resumed. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the suggestion was made to me on the subject of general debate I did not hear it. The arrangement between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself is, of course, subject to the approval of the committee, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] shall have half an hour and then two or three gentlemen five minutes, and that then we will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly. Mr. MANN. I was perfectly willing to proceed with the reading of the bill a moment ago, although the understanding before had been that the bill would not be read to-night, with the idea that if there was any contested matter any Member could stop the proceedings; but I would like to inquire whether we can not have an understanding that at the conclusion of general debate, general debate being closed, the bill shall not be proceeded with to-night under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The understanding was that we should begin to read the bill under the five-minute rule and then rise.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to reading the first paragraph. All I wanted was some understanding about it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is no objection, as far as I am concerned, to reading the first paragraph and then for the committee to rise. There are several gentlemen on the committee who have not spoken, among them the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Weeks], because of their desire to close debate and let the House proceed with the reading of the bill; but they will desire to speak when we come to the reading of certain paragraphs in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois to vacating the proceedings under the five-minute rule?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss for a few minutes two questions which I think are of great importance to the material and intellectual well-being of the people of our whole country-that of good roads and the parcel post.

Although my people have for 14 years honored me with a seat in this House, this is the first good-roads speech that I have delivered here during that whole time-not because I did not believe this question one of prime importance, nor because I doubted the constitutional power of the Federal Government to build roads for the benefit of the mail service. Neither of these propositions have I ever doubted. The question of the importance of the subject needs no argument, but is selfevident. The question of the right of the Government to engage in this character of internal improvement is especially embraced in that clause of the Federal Constitution which con-fers upon Congress the power "to establish post offices and post roads." This power was claimed and exercised even while the Constitution was young by some of the very legislators who helped to frame it, and was upheld by the highest court of the land while it was contemporary with the men from whose fertile brain that great instrument was evolved. So the right of Congress to legislate in the interest of good roads has long since passed the stage of academic debate, and to discuss it now would be but the enunciation of a truism.

I have not heretofore introduced a bill looking to the carrying out of this right, nor spoken upon the subject, because for the past 15 years Congress and the President have been actually running wild on pensions, big armies, and a great navy. I have often spoken on good roads to my people at home, but have told them each time that I saw no hope of Government aid for them until we stopped this eternal extravagance for the Army and the Navy. If the Republican Party had continued its carnival of riotous extravagance, it would still be utterly impossible to take a single step looking to the promotion of substantial legislation in the interest of this character of internal improvement.

But at the last election the people took matters into their own hands, and with the ballot drove from the Capitol many of those who had so long made this House a den of money When a Democratic House took changers and buccaneers. charge we found a bankrupt Treasury and a tax-ridden people. This Democratic House has already cut off millions of dollars from the Army appropriations, and if not balked by a Republican Senate we will further check the rapacity of Republican cormorants.

In the Democratic caucus I offered a resolution that no appropriation for battleships should be made at this session. DERWOOD and CLARK and other Democratic leaders rallied to its support, and it was adopted. The Republican Secretary of the Navy and the battleship allies fairly stood on their hind legs and howled, but the second Democratic caucus strengthened the cords that fettered those who want to waste the money of the taxpayers, and now no Democrat, without bolting his party caucus, can lend his vote to this wasteful extravagance.

The Secretary of the Navy has shown that two battleships of the size demanded will cost about $15,000,000 each. Thus we have saved nearly $30,000,000 by cutting off these two items alone. Had battleships been provided for, those of us from the interior would have insisted on a public-buildings bill of some $16,000,000. I have all the time contended that both these expenditures should go over, but that if the coast cities were going to loot the Treasury for battleships, the towns in the interior must not be ignored. My contention that both should be omitted prevailed, and for the first time since I have been in Congress I feel that this Democratic economy will authorize us to start a liberal expenditure for good roads. I have therefore introduced the bill, which I insert in the Record, looking to that end:

A bill (H. R. 22768) providing that the United States shall in certain cases make compensation for the use of highways for carrying free rural-delivery mail.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, the civil subdivisions thereof, and companies incorporated under the laws of the several States are classified as corporated under the laws of the several states are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace well-graded roads outside of incorporated cities, towns, and villages of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, not less than 20 feet wide between the ditches, well drained, with a wagon way or road track not less than 12 feet wide, composed of macadam not less than 6 inches thick, rolled, bonded, and maintained with a smooth, firm surface, both shoulders and roadway properly constructed and continuously cared for; and other roads equally serviceable, durable, and expensive.

Class B shall embrace well-graded roads outside of incorporated cities, towns, and villages of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, 20 feet wide between the side ditches, well drained, with a wagon way or road track 12 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, shells, sand, clay, or gravel, not less than 8 inches thick, continuously kept well compacted, and with a firm, smooth surface, with roadway well and properly crowned, so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches.

Class C shall embrace roads outside of incorporated cities, towns, and villages of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, which shall be kept well graded, crowned, and drained to a width of not less than 18 feet, with splitlog drag or other proper means, so as to be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

SEC. 2. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, or of any company incorporated under the laws of any State, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting free rural-delivery mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $30 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C.

SEC. 3. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers or persons entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

SEC. 4. That this act shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

This bill I have framed in collaboration with the gentleman from Missouri, Judge Shackleford, and his bill and mine are in many essential features the same. In my opinion it is the fairest and at the same time the most efficient proposition that I have ever seen, both for the encouragement and the construction of good roads.

We all concede that it would not be right for the Federal Government to bear all the burden of road building, and this bill divides it between the Government and the counties and communities affected, and at the same time leaves the supervision and control in the hands of the local authorities, where it ought The bill starts in on routes used for transporting rural free-delivery mail, because to make it apply to all mail routes, I feared, would make the expense so heavy that the present condition of the Treasury could not stand it, and as soon as it is installed on these routes it will be but a step to make it apply to all mail routes.

But since the introduction of my bill the Committee on Agriculture, after careful investigation, has found that to make it apply to all rural star routes as well as to rural free-delivery routes will cost but a few millions more and has reported a bill thus amended. I heartily indorse this amendment and hope the bill will pass as amended.

Again, under the terms of the bill the Government will not pay for the use of the routes unless they measure up to a certain standard and increase that sum as the standard becomes higher. This will so encourage the improvement of such roads that within the next year or two after its passage an impetus will be given to road improvement by the local authorities that has never before been known.

Again, it will be an encouragement to the establishment of rural mail routes, and they are the greatest educators that the Federal Government has ever provided for the people in the rural districts. Some Utopian theorists have begun to advocate a system of great highways extending across the continent or across the States. I have never taken stock in any such big notions, because these visionary schemes in the interest of automobilists put the building of roads further and further away from the great masses of the people, who will never see them and yet will bear the increased burden of taxes for their construction. If some such bill as mine were enacted into law, it would head off such chimerical schemes as these.

The cost of one battleship would more than pay the expense incurred by my bill for a whole year, and if, when the Democratic Party is placed in entire control of the Government, as it will be at the next election, we will make other savings that will warrant the further extension of this magnificent system.

If this Democratic House should pass this bill and put a check on the battleship craze it would fully justify the good judgment of the people in whipping from the House those who had for 15 years betrayed the voters who had trusted them. On the battleship proposition within the last few days my attention has been called to the fact that the great leaders in England and Germany have noted the disposition of our country to curtail its mad navy-building program and are seriously considering the propriety of following our example.

The following figures relative to our cost of armament are taken from the World's Peace Foundation, being a compilation with deductions taken from the Stateman's Year Book and the Almanach de Gotha, and are therefore to be considered authoritative.

The interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States is about $915,000,000.

In the past 30 years, since 1881, we have spent over $4,000,000,000 for military purposes, exclusive of pensions.

Had the Republican Party during that time adopted a policy of saving one-third of that amount the result would have been more than enough to extinguish the national interest-bearing indebtedness as it stands to-day. In other words, had we been blessed with a rational policy of curtailment, instead of cursed with an irrational policy of extravagance, we would have made it possible to extinguish this heavy national indebtedness and relieve our people of the burden of ever-increasing expenditures for warlike preparation in time of peace.

The average cost per man in the United States Army is about $1,000 per year, and this applies to, say, $5,000 men.

The present average cost per year of the Army and Navy of the United States for every person in the United States is about $3.07.

The United States spends per year on the Army and Navypensions not considered—on an average of 43 per cent of her total expenditures.

The expenditures on the Army and Navy of the United States per year comprise a larger percentage of the total expenditures of the Government than does that of any other country in the world, except Germany. Germany exceeds the United States only about two-tenths of 1 per cent—that of the United States being approximately 43.3 per cent and that of Germany 43.5 Yet from those who cry for military preponderance per cent. and supremacy we are constantly hearing the criticism that we are unprepared for war; that our Army is inefficient and insufficient; and that our battleships are obsolete and could not cope with the Dreadnaughts of other nations.

In the past 30 years our Navy alone has cost us $1,450,920,000. Last year our naval expenditures were $120,729,000, which exceeded the naval expenditures of 30 years ago by $107,192,000. In the past 30 years our Army has cost us $2,295,950,000.

Last year our Army expenditures were $162,357,000, which exceeded those of 30 years ago by $124,240,000.

With such an ever-increasing drain on the people for the support of a still insufficient Army and Navy, as they say, where is it to stop? Our total Army and Navy expenditures on a peaceful basis amount to the fabulous sum of $283,085,887 per annum. Added to this we have an annual drain for pensions as a result of past wars amounting to $157,980,575, or 24.1 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government.

Thus do we find our total war expenditures, including Army, Navy, and pensions, amount to $441,066,462, or 67.4 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government. In what an anomalous relation with civilization and universal peace do we find ourselves when more than two-thirds of our present total annual expenditure is for expenses incurred in past wars and in preparation for problematical future wars, leaving less than one-third for all civil constructive purposes. And yet there are those who would throw upon our shoulders an additional amount of more than $60,000,000 for pensions, and those who would mold into plate and Springfield rifles that parsimonious little remnant which is left to be appropriated for the promotion of those constructive and salutary projects of internal improvements of which good roads and parcel post are only two examples.

On the question of parcel post I am glad that a Democratic Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has for the first time reported a bill taking a step toward the inauguration of a general system of parcel post. I wish the committee could have seen its way clear to make the system general at once, and would gladly have supported such a proposition. But I realize the magnitude of the question, and believe the committee has done the very best it could under present conditions.

It has given us the parcel post on rural free-delivery routes, and has authorized a commission to investigate and report to Congress the feasibility of making the system general. The express companies have sought to arouse the merchants against it, and are trying to make them believe that it will mean the ruin of the merchant in the country and the small towns. Mr. Chairman, as one interested in a mercantile establishment in the country and in a small city, I want to say that I do not believe one word of their direful prophesies.

We already have a general parcel post up to 4 pounds, and by international agreement a foreigner in nearly every country in Europe can send 11 pounds to any point in the United States, and to say that extending it to 11 pounds here will ruin the mer chants is utterly absurd. On the other hand, I believe that it will be of great benefit both to the merchant and the customer. The express companies have the greatest monopoly and trust of almost any in the country, and have made their rates so exorbitant that their profits are enormous. This competition between them and the Government will force them to so reduce their rates that both the merchant and the consumer will be vastly benefited thereby.

The reduction of rates on these lighter packages will necessarily force them to reduce them on the heavier; if not voluntarily, the Interstate Commerce Commission will compel them to do so. In this way the merchant, in my opinion, will in the end be as substantially benefited as even the farmer or other consumer, and finally the Government will force some kind of an arrangement with the express companies by which it will control and regulate the cost of all shipments on their lines.

In regard to the enormous profits being made by the express companies, I desire at this point to quote from an excellent speech made on the subject a few days ago by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Gnegg]. Although a new Member, he was appointed to the great Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He has shown that he has given profound thought to the subject, and his speech shows that the Democratic Party made no mistake in assigning him in his first term to one of the most important committees of the House. He said:

THE EXPRESS COMPANIES AND THE PARCEL POST.

THE EXPRESS COMPANIES AND THE PARCEL POST.

It is true that for years the express companies have been preying upon the people of the country who have had occasion and necessity to ship packages and parcels over their routes. It is also true that these express companies have made fabulous sums from their business. The revelations made in the Interstate Commerce Commission investigation into the conduct of the express business are astounding. For instance, it was discovered that the earnings of one company from the time of its formation to the time of the hearings had been $598,158,930 and in that time it had distributed dividends amounting to $43,500,000, yet it practically began business without a cent of actually invested capital. The interstate Commerce Commission, in its second annual report on the statistics of express companies in the United States, for the year ended June 30, 1910, shows that the net operating revenue of the 13 companies covered by its report increased from $12,294,008 in 1900 to $14,508,280 in 1910, a gain of $2,214,272, or 18,91 per cent. I only offer these figures at this time for the purpose of showing that if the Federal Government undertakes to go into this business of a general parcel post—and it can do so at a profit—it will practically wipe out any deficit in the Post Office Department. Department.

These great giants are loath to surrender any part of these enormous revenues, and with the cunning of avarice have tried to make the mail-order houses the scarecrow with which to frighten the country merchant. In this connection I will read a letter from a rural constituent who, with that splendid common-sense characteristic of the countryman, shows the fallacy of the contention of the express companies more forcibly than I could possibly do:

R. F. D. No. 4, March 19, 1912.

Hon. John L. Burnett,
House of Representatives.

Dean Sir: I notice that a parcel-post bill is now before Congress. As southern commercial interests seem to be making a concerted opposition to it under a misapprehension of its effects, I desire, as a farmer, to say that its benefits to the country would be as great as the rural free delivery.

You have had opportunities to see that it has not broken up the small merchant in the countries you visited in the interest of immigration.

small merchant in the countries you visited in the interest of many tion.

There is another phase of the question which seems to me to be related to the tariff question. Gentlemen who are opposing parcels post lay great stress on the fact that the tariff prevents us buying in the cheaper markets of the world, yet ignore the fact that, with the passage of this bill, if the local merchant did not keep the goods needed by his customers, they could have a wider field in which to make their dealings and the revenue derived would go toward making the rural free-delivery system self-sustaining.

As a farmer, living 11 miles from Cullman, there are many times that things are needed, especially in busy times, when a cail on the phone would bring it to our door at a minimum expense. Hoping you and our Senators will see fit to support this measure,

I am, sir, yours, truly,

C. J. Higgins.

A few days ago I received a letter on this subject from the editor of the Interstate Grocer, in which he tries to frighten and bulldoze Congressmen into opposing the parcel-post rider recommended in the bill under consideration. I will read the letter and my reply to the same:

letter and my reply to the same:

THE INTERSTATE GROCER,
St. Louis, March 21, 1912.

Dear Sir: The time is rapidly approaching when Congress will be called upon to vote on the general parcel-post rider to the Post Office appropriation bill. As you probably know, the retail merchants of the country are opposed to parcel post, while the mail-order catalogue houses are in favor of it. There is no need to take up your time with reasons why parcel post should or should not come into being. You have your own convictions in the matter. What we want is to have an expression from you as to whether you will or will not vote for parcel post.

an expression from you as to whether you will or will not vote for parcel post.

You probably know the sentiment of your district and will be guided by it. You know how you will vote. If you have the courage of your convictions, if you are strong enough to give your candid and definite opinion, we want it. Please do not evade the issue. The retailers of of the country want to know your sentiments, and those Members of the Congress who do not answer one way or another will be considered as favoring parcel post. This letter to you will be published in the Interstate Grocer of March 23. Your answer will be published in the issue following its receipt, and a record will be kept of those Representatives who answer, so that the retailers will know how they stand on parcel post.

Thanking you for an early reply,
We remain,

THE INTERSTATE GROCER, F. W. LAWSON, Editor.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he answered the letter.

Mr. BURNETT. I did, and will read my reply:

APRIL 10, 1912.

F. W. LAWSON, Editor, St. Louis, Mo.

F. W. Lawson, Editor, St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Sir: Your bluffing letter of the 21st ultimo was received several days ago. I can answer you without any hesitation in regard to my position on the parcel post.

I am for general parcel post, rural parcel post, and, if I can get nothing better, will vote for the parcel-post rider on the Post Office appropriation bill.

I have an interest in a grocery store in my home city of Gadsden, Ala.; in a general merchandise store in Cedar Bluff, Ala.; and in a wholesale and retail hardware corporation in Gadsden, Ala.; and from the standpoint of one interested in all these, as well as a Representative of honest people, I desire in most positive terms to express my condemnation of the mendacious statements being sent out broadcast by the express companies and their allies.

I will thank you to publish this letter in full in your paper and to send me half a dozen copies and the bill for the same.

The express companies and their allies are trying to make the merchants in the small towns and the country believe that a general parcel post will drive them out of business, when they all know that it is absolutely untrue. But that is just the kind of methods which this gigantic trust is resorting to to try to buildoze Members of Congress into doing its bidding. I am reliably informed that there are no large mall-order houses in any of the civilized countries which have parcel post, and from travel and personal observation in those countries I know it has not driven out the merchants in the country and the small towns.

In my opinion it will force the express companies to reduce their exorbitant rates and in that way benefit both the merchant and his customer. That is the real reason why the express companies are working every agency possible to arouse the merchants against the passage of the bill.

Having answered your questions, I hope you will, under oath, answer a few for me:

You have attempted to frighten Members of Congress by threatening to publish their letters; I now beg you to do so.

Yours, respectfully,

John L. Burnett.

[Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentle-man if he received any reply to that letter?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I have not had time as yet. I expect a reply, and no doubt it will be in kind, and perhaps be published.

I was glad to see that almost every Member who answered him defied his brazen threats and boldly declared themselves in favor of the parcel post. It is delightful to see that so many of my colleagues in Congress so often hurl defiance in the teeth of those who would hold over them the Damoeles sword of defeat if they refuse to "Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning." [Applause.]

My distinguished friend from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] has forcefully presented a proposition for the Government to establish lish a postal express, and by purchase or condemnation to take over the business and property of the express companies to the extent necessary for this purpose. There are many excellent features in the proposition, but it is problematical at this time what the cost of acquiring the contracts and property of the express companies would be on account of the enormous outside holdings of the companies. But, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that if a general parcel post were established by the Government, in less than two years these properties could be acquired for millions of dollars less than if we sought to acquire them in the first instance.

The discussion here to-day of the various propositions for parcel post and for postal express brings out so many divergent opinions that it vindicates the wisdom of the committee in providing a commission to carefully investigate these different questions at once and report to Congress the result of their investigations.

However favorably I may view the suggestions of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Goeke], yet I would be unwilling to commit the Government to the policy advocated by them without a careful investigation of those policies. Of course the express companies can have no objection to the rural parcel post, except that it is a step in the direction of a general parcel post or express post, but to me that is one of the strongest arguments in its favor.

Mr. Chairman, I can not close my remarks without commending the committee for even the slight increase of pay which they have given to the rural carriers of the country. These faithful servants of the Government are doing a great work for the rural districts, and when the Democrats at the next election secure the President and the Senate and continue their plan of an economical administration of the Government, I believe they will do further justice to those heroic public servants by fixing their salaries on a basis of $100 per month for standard routes. [Applause.]

The present Postmaster General has boastfully asserted that he has curtailed expenses in his department until the postal service has been changed from a deficit to a surplus. The Post Office Committee has found that the boast of a surplus is untrue, and be it said to the shame of the Post Office Department that the reduction of expenses has been at the expense of the great masses of the people. Not a single rural route has been installed in my district in two years, and the same is true of most other districts represented by Democrats. The Postmaster General has played cheap politics by cutting off the means of educating the people in the rural districts where there are Democratic Congressmen. This calls for the condemnation of the people, and in November they will administer their rebuke.

For years the clerks in the first and second class post offices have been clampring for some relief from long boars and or have been clamoring for some relief from long hours and excessive work, but the Republican Party has turned a deaf ear to their just entreaties. This Democratic House has heeded their calls, and in this bill are giving them an eight-hour day, which is certainly long enough for any man to toil in that character of labor.

On the whole, the committee has done well, and deserves the approval of all who want to see Democratic principles triumph. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison].
Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, second only to the tariff, the parcel post is the most important question before the American people to-day. I doubt if any question in recent years has caused such an influx of letters, petitions, and protests to Members of Congress as has the parcel post, many of them protesting against its establishment, others advocating it, some expressing themselves in favor of the Sulzer bill, which limits the package to 11 pounds, with a flat rate throughout the country, others for a general parcel post without respect to rates or weight, while many are favoring the establishment of a parcel post on a zone system.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that such injury will come to the small merchant and shopkeeper as many of them in the small towns have thought. Neither do I believe that the wonderful benefits that some of the rural citizens honestly believe will come to them will ever be realized by the establishment of a parcel post. I believe that the benefits that will follow the establishment of a parcel post have been greatly exaggerated, and that the attendant injuries to the small merchant and shopkeeper have been inordinately magnified. I do not believe that the establishment of a parcel post will work to the injury of any man. It may be possible that in a few instances it will force the merchant in the country to sell his goods at a smaller profit in order to meet the prices of his competitor who may live at a distance, but no one ought to complain at this. What every good citizen ought to desire is that reasonable profits be made on honest investments, and that no monopoly should exist in business. "Competition is the life of trade," and the legitimate safeguard against monopolies.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert that part of the report of Mr. John W. Garrett, minister from the United States to Venezuela, in response to the inquiry sent him by Hon. JONATHAN BOURNE, chairman of the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee of the Senate, through the Secretary of State, as to how the parcel post affected the country merchant and shopkeeper in that country. I quote:

It seems to be the opinion that the small dealers in Venezuela obtain great advantages from using the parcel post to import their merchandisc wherever possible. The small dealers are thereby enabled fraquently to compete with the large importers, since they can introduce into the country the same goods as the large houses without the necessity of bringing in quantities beyond their capacity to handle.

Mr. Nicolay Grevstad, minister of the United States to Urugusy, under date of December 5, 1911, in his report says:

In the country districts the service is used especially by the small merchants, who in this way receive merchandise in small lots from the wholesale houses of the capital.

Mr. Robert Bacon, ambassador of the United States to France, in his report under date of October 2, 1911, says:

It would seem that they themselves (meaning small merchants and shopkcepers) find great facilities in this service for the needs of their

Mr. Wilson, minister of the United States to Mexico, in his report dated September 13, 1911, says:

At times these very merchants are among the first to profit from the advantage of the parcel post, to secure certain kinds of merchandisc. It is for these reasons, perhaps, that they have never complained.

I could quote the reports of other representatives of the United States in foreign countries, showing the same condition, but it is useless. I shall content myself, with the consent of the committee, by inserting as a part of my remarks excerpts from the reports of our representatives in every foreign country having a parcel post, made last year at the request of Senator BOURNE, chairman of the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee of the Senate.

With the permission of the committee, I will insert in my remarks the correspondence between Senator Bourne and Mr. Huntington Wilson, Assistant Secretary of State, in calling for this information:

PARCEL POST IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

In pursuance of a resolution adopted by the Senate on June 16, 1911, Hon. JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., chairman of the subcommittee on parcel post of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, addressed the following letter to the State Department:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS,
August 18, 1911.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

The honorable the Secretary of State.

My Dear Mr. Szchetary: I inclose herewith copy of Senate resolution 56, adopted by the Senate June 16, 1911. Under authority of same I am taking preliminary steps for the collation of obtainable data in re parcel post as it is now in operation in foreign countries. I would respectfully request your cooperation in this matter and would ask you to kindly instruct the diplomatic representatives of the United States in countries operating a parcel or package post, to obtain from the several countries to which they are accredited the fullest possible information with respect to such parcel or package post. Such information should consist chiefly of an abstract of the law and the rules and regulations governing the operation of the parcel post; the weight limit of parcels; the rate or rates of postage; the greatest dimensions of parcels accepted for mailing; whether delivery of parcels is made to the residence of the addressee or to some intermediate point, such as the nearest post office or railway station, and if to an intermediate point, what are the particulars concerning the rate of postage, and what means are used to notify the addressee that a package awaits him at such intermediate point; a statement of the revenue and expenditure and the amount of parcel-post business transacted during a torm of 10 years; a statement showing the additional postal equipment, if any, made necessary by the establishment of a parcel post; a statement showing in what particulars the transportation of parcels differs from the handling of letter mail; and whether the operation of the parcel post has caused any delay or difficulty in the prompt and satisfactory treatment of letter mail; a schedule of the articles which may or which may have been manifested before or since the establishment of the parcel post; a statement describing any opposition which may have been manifested before or since the establishment of the parcel post; a statement showing the attilude of the preciple with reference t

The State Department thereupon issued a special circular of instruction (which is herewith shown in full) to the diplomatic officers of the United States accredited to all countries in which the American Government is officially represented:

PARCEL-POST DATA. [Important and urgent.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 24, 1911.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States.

Washington, August 21, 1911.

To the Diplomatic Officers of the United States.

Gentemen: By a resolution adopted by the Senate on June 16, 1911, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is authorized and directed to Inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the postal system of the United States or in laws relating to the postal service, and particularly with reference to the establishment of a parcel post, and for this purpose to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress.

In connection with this resolution the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads are taking preliminary steps for the collation of obtainable data in regard to parcel post as it is now in operation in foreign countries, and Senator Bourare, chairman of the committee, has requested the department's cooperation in the matter to the end that the diplomatic representatives of the United States in countries operating a parcel or package post be instructed to obtain the fullest possible information with reference to such parcel or package post in the countries of their residence. The information, Senator Bourare states, should consist chiefly of an abstract of the law and the rules and regulations governing the operation of the parcel post; the weight limit of parcels; the rate or rates of postage; the greatest dimensions of parcels accepted for mailing; whether delivery of parcels is made to the residence of the addressee or to some intermediate point, such as the nearest post office or railway station, and if to an intermediate point, what are the particulars concerning the rate of postage and what means are used to notify the addressee that a package awaits him at such intermediate point; a statement of the revenue and expenditures and the amount of parcel-post business transacted during a term of 10 years; a statement showing the additional postal equipment, if any, made necessary by the establishment of a parcel post; a statement showing in what particulars the transportation of parcels differs from the handling of letter mail; and whether the operation of the parcel post has caused any delay or difficulty in the prompt and satisfactory treatment of letter mail; a schedule of the articles which may or which may not be sent by parcel post; a statement describing any opposition which may have been manifested before or since the establishment of the parcel post; information as to whother any common carriers exist similar in any way to the American express companies, and if so, a brief of their nature and their relation to the Government; whether the Government operates the railreads in whole or in part, and where it does, full information showing the bearing which this fact has on the operation of the parcel post; a statement showing the attitude of the people with reference to the parcel post and what benefits, if any, have resulted from its operation to the people at large; where two or more rates exist dependent on speed of transportation, such as it is understood exist in France, full information is desired; specific information as to whether shopkeepers in small towns claim that the parcel post militates against them and in favor of the large departmental or city stores.

If a parcel or package post is in operation by the Government to which you are accredited, it is desired that the information requested by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be procured and forwarded to the department with the greatest possible dispatch—by September 20 where that is practicable.

I am, gentlemen.

Your obedient servant,

Huntington Wilson,

Acting Secretary of State.

Henry Lane Wilson, representative of the United States in Mexico, in his report dated September 13, 1911, says:

Mexico, in his report dated September 13, 1911, says:

The dally increase in the work of the parcel-post service, both within and beyond the Mexican territory, is an indication of the favorable attitude of the general public toward the service.

There is no knowledge or evidence of any feeling on the part of the shopkeepers in small towns or claim that the parcel post militates against them and in favor of the large departmental or city stores.

The merchants of small localities find the greater part of their trade among persons who are not accustomed to avail themselves of the advantage of the parcel post; accordingly, they are not subjected to the competition which this service might cause them. Furthermore, they generally sell articles of immediate necessity, such as common cloths, hardware, etc., which would not bear the cost of transmission by parcel post. At times these very merchants are among the first to profit from the advantage of the parcel post, to secure certain kinds of merchandise. It is for these reasons, perhaps, that they have never complained.

N. Dominguez, representative of the United States in Morocco.

N. Dominguez, representative of the United States in Morocco, writing under date of September 12, 1911, says:

So far as any attitude is observable it is one of appreciation on the part of the public for the benefits of the parcel post, but these benefits are at present confined to very few, chiefly the foreign residents in the coast towns, and the handful of officials in Fez and Morocco City.

G. von der Meulen, acting representative of the United States in the Netherlands, under date of September 14, 1911, says:

Wherever possible the parcel-post service is carried on together with the letter post. Where the amount of the work of parcel post does not permit thereof, in that case, as in large centers, the parcel-post service is intrusted to a special staff of officials. The prompt and efficient handling of the letter post has not suffered by the introduction of the parcel post.

No complaint has ever been made by shopkeepers in small places that they have suffered from the parcel post in that the people, instead of purchasing their wares, have had recourse to the large stores in the big towns through the parcel post.

The representative of the United States in Peru, under date of September, 1911, in his report says:

Attitude of the people: The people in general show greater satisfaction with the parcel-post service, but not the retail merchants, with whose interest it competes, but this has not proved to be an obstacle to

J. J. Mendez, director general of the United States for Panama, in his report of October 27, 1911, says:

ama, in his report of October 27, 1911, says:

No opposition has been shown on the part of the public nor by commerce to the establishment of the parcel-post system; but, on the contrary, the facilities which this service lends by the interchange of merchandlse, packed and sent as parcels, has become so popular that the residents in the principal cities of the Republic of different nationalities from those countries with whom Panama has celebrated conventions constantly beg the representatives of their governments to initiate negotiations in that sense, as have done, in effect, various nations, as Spain and Central and South America. This directory general is about to enter into them.

The attitude of the public with relation to the service of parcel post has been that of approbation and acceptation, and the people have approved this service on account of the facilities which it lends, bringing by this means merchandise in small quantities and at the small cost or its freight.

The proprietors of establishments in small towns, and even those which are situated in the cities of Panama, Colon, and Bocas del Toro, and in the principal towns of the interior of the Republic, who do retail trade are those who derive the greatest benefit from the parcelpost system on account of the reasons which have been given previously—that is, small cost in the freight on the merchandise, packing, and system of transportation of the postal parcels.

Edwin V. Morgan, representative of the United States in Portugal, under date of September 20, 1911, says:

The establishment of the parcel-post service has forced the railway companies to reduce their freight rates on matter under 10 kilograms (22 pounds), and the people have benefited as a result.

On account of the illiteracy of the people the method of ordering by catalogue and by post does not obtain in Portugal. Hence the parcel post can not be said to have altered conditions or relations between the small town store and the large city one.

Roland B. Harvey, representative of the United States in Roumania, under date of October 2, 1911, says that in Roumaniathere is no opposition whatsoever to the parcel-post system. It has been in use here practically since the establishment of the post office and is taken as a matter of course.

I have heard of no complaints from the shopkeepers in small towns in regard to the parcel post militating against them.

Mr. Post Wheeler, minister of the United States in Russia, in his report dated September 30, 1911, in speaking of conditions in Russia, says thatshopkeepers in the smaller towns, as far as can be learned, do not claim to be materially injured by possible customers buying from the city stores through parcel post.

No private express or forwarding companies exist in Russia, and therefore there is no competition with the parcel post, carried on railways exclusively owned by the Government throughout the Empire; but no opposition has ever been manifested against the present system, and it is considered generally to be of great benefit to the people; the rates are cheap and delivery quick and sure.

William Hainke ministen of the United States in San Selve.

William Heimke, minister of the United States in San Salvador, speaking of the workings of the parcel post in that country, says:

There has been no known opposition either before or after the establishment of the parcel-post service.

The people benefit by the parcel-post service in that they can provide themselves, from the principal centers, with those articles which can not be obtained in their locality; it enables them to acquire in this way those articles which could not reach them by ordinary mail, and, undoubtedly, it brings the advantages of the cheapness and the speed of their transmission.

Mr. Robert Woods Bliss, chargé d'affaires ad interim, in making report on October 5, 1911, on the workings of the parcel post in Argentina says:

post in Argentina says:

Q. A statement describing any opposition which may have been manifested before or since the establishment of the parcel post?

A. There has been no opposition.

Q. What is the attitude of the people with reference to the parcel post, and what benefits, if any, have resulted from its operation to the people at large?

A. The people in general and particularly the merchants have shown themselves to be in sympathy with the parcel-post service. The benefits resulting from this service have been the possibility of interchanging small packages at reduced rates, the rapidity of transportation, and the security made possible by its service.

A proof of the favorable attitude of the people toward this service is shown by its increase since the inauguration in 1887, in which year only 10,185 parcels were carried compared with the 790,303 parcels carried in 1910.

Mr. Ethelbert Watts, consul general in Belgium, in his report dated November 14, 1911, says:

dated November 14, 1911, says:

The parcel post has proven very successful in Belgium, not only with the public, but the Government has realized large profit in this department, but there are no statistics published to show details.

It is interesting to note what effect this service has on the business of the small merchants in the country villages, whether they suffer a material loss as a consequence of the larger merchants in the cities supplying their customers, and it appears they have not suffered a loss in their business, for they are the very ones who make the most use of the parcel-post service. If they do not have an article asked for, they at once order it for their customer and have it sent by parcel post.

In general, the people of the country and the small towns, except the rich, do not use the parcel post much in ordering things from the city, but buy at home, as they did before this system was started.

The richer class and the summer people who pass several weeks every year in the numerous seashore and mountain resorts of Belgium use the parcel post a great deal, but even before the advent of this service they always went to the city to do their most important shopping.

Mr. Horace G. Knowles, representative of the United States in Bolivia, in making report on October 24, 1911, of the workings of the parcel-post system in Bolivia, says:

The parcel-post service, because of its many advantages over the ordinary freight service, is considered indispensable by not only the general public, but also by all commercial houses.

The parcel-post service has never given cause for local merchants to complain or protest, but, on the contrary, they could not well do without it. They find it a quick and economical way to get their goods, and the loss by direct orders to stores in the larger cities is comparatively small.

The representative of the United States in China, in his report dated October 10, 1911, says:

appreciation of its benefits. These benefits are those which spring anywhere from a trustworthy and speedy agency for the transmission

Complaints of shopkeepers: Large department stores being unknown among the Chinese, no occasion for complaints from small-shop keepers have yet developed.

A. H. Frazier, of the American legation in Colombia, in his report of October 7, 1911, says:

report of October 7, 1911, says:

No opposition has manifested itself before or since the establishment of the parcel post. No common carriers exist, since the country is too vast and the means of communication too inadequate to permit of any private agency undertaking such a service.

The parcel post, being the only means of transporting packages from one part of the Republic to another, except over the few railroads and steamship lines on the rivers of Colombia and where there are established mule trains, has resulted in great benefit to the country. The mail-order business is as yet undeveloped in Colombia; in consequence shopkeepers in small towns do not have to compete with the department stores in the larger centers; moreover, the department store as it is known in the United States and Europe does not exist in Colombia.

The representative of the United States in Denmark, in writing from Copenhagen under date of December 14, 1911,

There has been no opposition against the carrying of packages by the postal service.

The postal package service is made use of by all classes of the population.

No complaints of the kind referred to have been made against the postal package service.

Mr. Evan E. Young, representative of the United States in Ecuador, in his report dated October 19, 1911, says:

No opposition has been encountered either before or after the establishment of the parcel post; on the contrary, great benefit has been observed to commerce from this service.

The people at large have been greatly benefited by the parcel post on account of the prompt service and also by the ease with which they can send their merchandise abroad.

Finally, the merchanis who export in large quantities receive the same benefits as those who send out but small amounts.

Paul Knabenshue, vice consul general in Egypt, under date of October 17, 1911, says:

Q. Specific information as to whether shopkeepers in small towns claim that parcel post militates against them in favor of the large departmental or city stores.

A. No such complaint.

Joseph C. Grew, representative of the United States in Hungary, in his report dated September 21, 1911, says:

attitude of the people: The attitude of the people toward the parcel post is very much the same as that manifested toward the letter post, i. e., that both are such long-established institutions that they are taken as a matter of course. The three classes of parcels—ordinary, special-delivery, and "urgent."—are a special benefit, inasmuch as they afford the public a variety of methods of shipment and enable them to expedite delivery at a small additional cost.

Opposition to the parcel post: The parcel post has been so long established in Hungary that if there was any opposition to its establishment it was so many years ago that it has been long forgotten, and no statement as to what it may have been is now obtainable. It may be assumed, however, that if there was any opposition it came from those companies and individuals who were engaged in the express business before the parcel post existed. Since its establishment its obvious advantages have made it a most popular institution, and nothing but praise is heard for it.

Opposition of shopkeepers in small towns: Provincial shopkeepers in Hungary consider the parcel post as a good friend rather than as a force which militates against them. This may be because the mail-order business is not well developed in Hungary, and the public, as a rule, prefers to see the article to be bought rather than buy through catalogues. The parcel post enables the small shopkeeper in some remote part of Hungary to secure supplies from the commercial centers at a cost much less than he would have to pay were they to be placed in private hands. The dispatch and cheapness of the parcel post have done great service in the development of provincial commerce, and there appears to be no opposition among the shopkeepers.

John G. A. Leishman, representative of the United States in Italy, in his report dated October 1, 1911, says:

The Italian people now accept parcel post as a matter of course and regard it as a necessity, since it not only facilitates the transportation of parcels, but also makes it possible to forward articles to parts of the Kingdom which it would be otherwise impossible to reach, owing to the fact that private companies could not afford to transact the business at rates low enough to permit the transportation of parcels to such remote localities.

As parcel post has now been successfully operated in Italy for the last 30 years, no claims are put forth by shopkeepers in small towns that it militates against them and in favor of the larger shops situated in cities. They accept parcel post as an established fact, although it is quite conceivable that in some instances business may be diverted from the smaller to the larger centers.

Montgomery Schuyler, representative of the United States in Japan, under date of October 2, 1911, says:

The parcel post has been popular ever since its inception, and its benefits are fully recognized by the people. It fills an important need in Japan, where the private forwarding business has not reached the same state of efficiency as elsewhere. The Government is receiving constant applications and petitions for the extension of the weight and size of mainable parcels.

Firms doing a mail-order business depend upon the parcel post, but do not compete with the shopkeepers in small towns. The Japanese country folk live very simply, and the variety of goods sold by local houses is very limited; special articles must be ordered from the large towns. The Government has not received any complaints from rural shopkeepers about the parcel post militating against them. I have the honor to be sir,

Mr. John C. Grew, minister to Austria, reporting under date of September 16, 1911, says:

The embassy is informed by the Austrian postal authorities that no direct complaint has ever been submitted to them to the effect that the parcel-post system causes injury to the small traders of the country towners.

direct complaint has ever been submitted to them to the effect that the parcel-post system causes injury to the small traders of the country towns.

In considering this question it must be borne in mind that the so-called department store is in Austria still in its infancy. While comparatively large stores exist in all the greater cities, especially in Vienna, which stores depend to a great extent on their country trade, there are but two stores in Vienna which deserve the name of "department stores" and both of them together would approximately represent the size of a very medium department store in New York.

But such large houses as there are usually send out traveling salesmen, who solicit trade among the small mechanics, shoemakers, milliners, tailors (to whom they offer especially cloth linings), etc., but do not go near the direct consumers, and as the goods ordered are delivered by parcel post, the system thus shows an injury to the small trader. Some of the consumers also order direct by mail from the larger city stores.

Yet, practically speaking, the effect of the parcel-post system upon the small trader in the country and the lesser towns can not properly be established, for the reason that the system in Austria is not a new venture, having existed as long as the mail system. Certainly its effect can not be compared to any good purpose with the probable results of the same system in America, where the number and size of the larger city stores render the circumstances quite different from those obtaining in Austria. If the small trader in this country has anything to complain of it is the great number of peddlers who swarm into the smaller towns and villages and there sell city goods to the detriment of the village shopkeepers themselves.

The representative of the United States in Chile, in his report

The representative of the United States in Chile, in his report dated September 28, 1911, says:

General observations: Mail-order business from the larger towns to the country districts has not made great strides, and conditions differ widely in this respect from those in the United States. The complaint, if there should be any, would come more likely from the Chilean merchants as against the foreign houses sending goods here by parcel post direct to customer. There is but one properly so-called depart-ment store in Santiago

Mr. Robert Bacon, ambassador of the United States in France, under date of October 2, 1911, says:

The institution of the parcel-post service has rapidly become popular owing to its simplicity and to the facilities it affords to commerce, industry, and agriculture to forward goods in small quantities at reduced rates. It is easy to realize by the ever constant progression of the business (see Doc. No. 5; translation on p. 92) the services rendered and the reception given by the people to this innovation. The administration has not yet received any complaint from shopkeepers in small towns concerning the advantages which large departmental or city stores would reap from the parcel-post system and the prejudice which it would cause them. It would seem that they themselves find great facilities in this service for the needs of their retail trade.

States.

It can not be discovered that there is any opposition by shopkeepers in small towns on the ground that the parcel post operates to their damage in favor of large department stores. The conditions governing retail trade in Germany are so different from those of the United States that it is almost impossible to draw a parallel on this point. There is comparatively little trade done by large German department stores—which in point of fact are comparatively few—outside the immediate delivery area of their respective cities.

Frederic Ogden de Billier, representative of the United States in Greece, in his dispatch dated September 26, 1911, says:

The parcel-post service has proved popular with the public, which has found a great benefit in the simplicity and ease of the service.

Q. Has any opposition been manifested before or since the establishment of the parcel-post service?

A. No opposition has ever been raised to the parcel-post service; on the contrary, it assumes greater volume daily, showing that the public welcomes it gladly because of the benefits it confers.

Q. Do shopkeepers in small towns claim that the parcel post militates against them and in favor of the large departmental or city stores?

A. So far it has not been observed that small commercial houses of neighboring towns have made complaint that the parcel-post service has been injurious to them; in fact, this service gives them facilities for filling small mail orders with little capital.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid. United States ambassador to England, in

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, United States ambassador to England, in his report of September 13, 1911, on the parcel post in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, says:

Attitude of the people to parcel post: There is reason to think that the parcel post is much appreciated by the general public, as parcels can be posted at any post office (about 24,000 in number) for delivery at any address, however remote, for a payment in accordance with a uniform and well-known scale of charges, irrespective of distance.

Opposition from interested parties, and especially the attitude of shopkeepers in small towns toward the parcel post: There was naturally opposition (though neither widespread nor organized) on the part of some whose interests were adversely concerned to the introduction of a parcel post, but there was a preponderating body of public opinion in its favor, and since its introduction there has been no kind of organized protest against its continuance, either from carriers or from the smaller retail traders or from others. A few years ago, however, a proposal to adopt the "cash-on-delivery" system (i. e., a system of collection from the addressee of the price of goods purchased and its remittance to the sender) excited such strong protest from shop-keepers in villages and small towns, who urged that the scheme would do them a great injury by diverting local trade to the large stores in cities, that the system has not yet been adopted in the inland service, although it has been applied to the parcel post between the United Kingdom and certain Crown colonies.

Mr. Nicolay A. Grevstad, minister of the United States to Uruguay, under date of December 5, 1911, in his report says:

In the country districts the service is used especially by small merchants, who in this way receive merchandise in small lots from the wholesale houses of the capital. In those districts the packages remain at the disposition of the interested party or parties in the office of the city or village where those parties reside, or in the nearest office to their residence in such cases where the residences are in the middle of the ranch. In any event notice is sent to the interested party to come for his package.

Mr. H. C. May, representative of the United States in Sweden, in his report under date of December 22, 1911, in speaking of Sweden, says:

The establishment of parcel post has been a great advantage to the public and has met with no opposition in any quarter.

The continually increasing operation of parcel post seems to prove that it enjoys the confidence of the public.

The parcel-post operation seems in a high degree to promote the interchange of goods, and as the inland fees are fixed without any regard to the distance of transportation it appears to be of great importance, especially for the distant parts of the country, which are naturally worse off in respect of means of communication.

No complaints in this respect have been made to the post-office department.

Mr. H. S. Boutell, minister to Switzerland, in his report dated September 11, 1911, speaking of the parcel post in Switzerland,

The people have always shown their sympathy for the parcel post, the establishment of which refers back for more than a century. Through its promptness and security it has facilitated commercial transactions and the relations in general. The fact that the parcels are admitted to the greater part of the trains, and that—according to the importance of the localities—they are distributed one, two, three, and even four times a day, sufficiently illustrates how numerous the advantages enjoyed by the people are.

There have never been complaints made in this connection; the parcel post established in cities and in the country offers the same benefits to each. The uniform rates for all Switzerland up to the weight of 20 kilograms (44 pounds) (pp. 25 and 26 of the Recuell, see pp. 258–250) do, on the contrary, constitute a real advantage for the small shopkeepers in less important cities, because they enable them to procure certain merchandise under the same conditions of transportation (cost of transportation) as the large departmental or city stores. city stores

Mr. John W. Garrett, minister to Venezuela, in his report of September 15, 1911, says:

No opposition: It is stated that there has been and is now no opposition to the parcel post.

Attitude of public: The public appears to realize the advantages of the system and frequently has recourse to it, chiefly for the purpose of importing articles of clothing in small quantities.

In these reports from all of the foreign countries where the parcel post has been established, experimented with, and observed, the almost unanimous consensus of opinion of the people living there, judging by the reports, is that the parcel post works injury to no one, but benefits all. Out of the 34 countries where the parcel post is established these reports show that in only one or two countries does the merchant and shopkeeper offer the slightest complaint.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize that in most of the foreign countries the conditions are different from conditions in the United States, that in some there are no large department stores, that some own and operate their own railroads, and that hardly any of them are as large in area as the United States; but, Mr. Chairman, many of these countries do have the large department stores, and not all of them have government ownership of railroads, and if in those countries the parcel post has worked no injury to the small merchant and shopkeeper, but, on the contrary, has been beneficial to all, is it not natural to believe that the same result will follow in the United States? It is true that the great size of the United States will enter largely into the consideration of rates to be charged for transportation of the packages, and it is for this reason that I do not believe that we ought to establish a flat rate, thereby permitting packages of the same weight to be shipped from Chicago to Hattiesburg, Miss., at the same cost as from Jackson, Miss., doubt that the express companies will do the business on short hauls and the Government on the long hauls, the consequence being that the express companies will make large profits, while the Government will lose money.

I am not, Mr. Chairman, satisfied with the provisions for a parcel post as contained in this bill. I do not think they are broad enough. If the provisions of this bill are adopted, little is accomplished toward the establishment of a parcel post. The man who lives on a rural route-for instance, a route that runs out of Laurel, in my district-would be permitted to send an 11-pound package to Laurel or to receive an 11-pound package from Laurel, but he could not, in my opinion, under the provisions in this bill, send nor receive over a 4-pound package from his place on the rural route out of Laurel to or from Hattiesburg, and even though he desired to send a 4-pound package from his place to Hattiesburg he would have to pay 16 cents per pound, the present rate.

Mr. Chairman, the rural citizens of the country, as well as the urban population, will not be satisfied with this makeshift of a parcel post, and I hope that this committee will give to the country a parcel post that will allow at a reasonable rate, on the zone system, a package of, say, 25 pounds or any reasonable weight to be shipped not only over the rural routes, but to every place in the United States from any point on a rural or star route. The man who lives on a star route ought to be permitted to ship and receive parcels through the mails the same as the man who lives on a rural route. The man who does not live on a rural route is at enough disadvantage. Do not discriminate further against him. The parcel-post subject is a complex question, but I believe we can solve it and that the best solution to it is not a flat-rate system, but a zone system. In this connection I want to quote from the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Williams]. He says:

In this connection I want to quote from the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He says:

* * * I am hoping for the passage of a parcel-post bill based upon the zone system, where charges will be approximately according to the distance that the packages are carried, with the first zone (where the minimum charge would exist) constituted of the runal free-delivery routes and the charges increasing according to the well-recognized freight rule for each succeeding zone. That recognized freight rule, which is approximately carried out in fixing freight rates, "doubles the charge as the distance quadruples." Thus to illustrate: If the charge were made one-half cent a pound up to whatever weight was fixed in the bill—say 25 pounds, just for illustration—for the rural free-delivery zone, which would be 25 miles, then the charge for the next zone would be 1 cent a pound for not more than 100 miles; and the charge for the next zone would be 2 cents per pound for not over 400 miles; and the charge for the next zone would be 4 cents a pound for not more than 1,600 miles; and the next zone would be 8 cents a pound for all distances over 1,600 miles.

The country merchant would thus have virtually a free-delivery wagon furnished by the Government of the United States for his trade upon the rural free-delivery routes. Of course it would not be absolutely free, but the charge fixed would be so small that it would not be one-fiftieth (unless he did a very large business) of what he would have to pay if he kept a man and a horse and wagon and did his own delivering.

If the country merchant would go out of existence merely because people could buy things a little cheaper away from home from the great department stores in the large cities, he would go out of business now, without any parcel post—I mean if cheapness—they want an article quick; that is one thing; and they want certainty and safety of reclamation and exchange in case the article arrives damaged or the wrong article comes; that is another co

Mr. Chairman, the establishment of a scientific, general parcel post on a zone system will practically put the express companies out of business, unless they reduce their now exorbitant rates to the public. If we, by establishing a parcel-post system, cause the express companies to reduce their rates, then we have performed a great service, not only to the merchant, but to all classes of the people.

Surely no one save the express companies will object to a reduction of express charges. Surely no merchant will object to that, and yet the establishment of a genuine parcel post on the zone system will necessarily cause the express companies to reduce their rates or go out of business. In either case the great majority of people will be benefited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other word. I know, we all know, that this provision for a parcel post in the pending bill is subto Hattiesburg. If the flat rate is established, there can be no | ject to a point of order, and unless a special rule is brought in and adopted by this House making this parcel-post provision not subject to a point of order that possibly no parcel-post legislation will be enacted during this session of Congress. I have heard some rumors flying around that probably the Rules Committee would not report such a rule. I sincerely trust that such is not the case, and hope that a rule will be reported and adopted giving us the right to vote on this very important question in this appropriation bill, so that a parcel-post law may be enacted at this session of Congress.

In the event, Mr. Chairman, this rule is reported and adopted, amendments will be offered that contain the views I hold on the parcel post. I shall vote for them, and I trust they will be adopted; but should these amendments be voted down, then I shall vote for the provisions embodied in this bill in the hope that it will be the entering wedge, the initiation of a movement for a more general and beneficial parcel post in the future.

[Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Brown].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, the postal service is older than our civilization. In Second Chronicles we read, "The posts went with the letters from the King and his princes throughout all Israel," and Job says, "Now my days are swifter than the post. They flee away." The system derives its name from the posts or relays where the couriers ended their journeys and transferred their letters or packages to their successors. In the beginning these communications were royal privileges, exercised by kings and nobles of one country in correspondence with the rulers and potentates of another, or from the king to the commanding officers of his army. They were first written in wax and subsequently on parchment, and must necessarily have been bulky.

This mail service was conducted, first by runners, and then by horsemen, and we find even where it was carried in the early days of England by oxen; and many people remember the pony express whose daring and hardy riders carried mail and express across our western plains.

For centuries the government mail service, if it can be so designated, was exclusively the prerogative of kings and the The common people were denied its use. service in the early ages was carried on both by the government and by private enterprise. We are told that swift runners, with frequent relays, have covered as much as 200 miles in a day with special dispatches. Carrier pigeons have also been used for carrying dispatches, and even as late as the Battle of Waterloo a carrier pigeon took the advance news of Wellington's victory to London, and in this way the Rothschilds obtained the advance information of Napoleon's overwhelming defeat, which information they turned to commercial value and thereby laid the foundation of their subsequent colossal wealth. Thus we see that step by step, with the growth of civilization and the advance of knowledge, there has been a commensurate increase and development of the postal system.

In the early colonial days postal service was extremely high, cesting $1 to send a letter from the United States to Europe or from Europe to the United States, and even throughout our own land the amount of postage was governed by the distance the letter had to travel. It was for Ben Franklin, our first Postmaster General, who enjoyed the munificent salary of $1,000 a year, to systematize our post offices and bring them into a measurably satisfactory condition.

The history of the postage stamp is also especially interesting. To a Frenchman named De Valayer, who established a private postal system of his own, belongs the credit of using the first postage stamps. These were slips of paper bearing his inscription and were sold at different places throughout France, and when attached to a letter insured its transportation over his private lines. Spain was next to use the stamp, where a letter, after being stamped by the royal seal and coat of arms, would be carried by Government post. But to Julius Cresar must be accredited the beginning of the franking system. impress of his signet ring in the plastic sealing wax was abundant authority throughout all the known world to secure the safe conduct and free delivery of all his sealed commands. But to England more than all the nations of the modern world is due the greatest advances toward the perfection of a comprehensive postal system. The growth of civilization, the development of the human mind, the advance in literature, science, and art have developed in perfect harmony and step by step with the postal system and each dependent upon the other, and to-day a large portion of the commerce of the world is carried on through the mails. As the business of the world advanced new demands were made upon the Post Office Department. This great portfolio of the Government has always been slow to yield to these demands, and every change that it has made has been a step in the right direction.

To-day the people of the United States are making a new demand, a demand that will place the rural and agricultural districts almost upon the same plane as the man in the city. There the express companies deliver the packages at his door. Would not, under reasonable restrictions, the parcel post do the same for the man in the country? The demand for the parcel post is universal. There is not a community within the borders of the United States that will not be benefited by it, and the increased cost to the Government will be more than made up by the increased amount in postage. The parcel post will tend largely to distribute the blessings of this world. It will increase commerce; it will save time and money to the man on the farm, and increase the comforts and advantages of country life so the comparisons can no longer be urged in favor of the city home. While the postal service originally was the exclusive right of kings and nobles, under our present system of government this right belongs to the people. Their best interests must control it. Their expressed wishes upon the subject must be the law. It is urged that it will start competition with the express companies and hours their discovered and some their discovered and their discovered and some their discovered and the express companies and incur their disfavor and secure their opposition to the party in power, but as a Democrat I will say that I would be proud in this case of the enemies the Democratic Party has made.

Parcel post is but another step toward the perfection of the postal system. While it may be an innovation in this country it has been successfully tried in other nations of the world. Our Government is slow to change, and we may not get full and complete parcel post through Congress in any one bill, but certainly and surely it will come in time. The interests of the people demand it; commerce demands it; and the advancement of our civilization requires it. There is another great necessity, however, that must go hand in hand with a perfect postal system, and without it the parcel post or the rural free delivery can never become a perfect success-that is good roads. The good-roads movement is as broad as our land. Every community is crying out for increased facilities of transportation. There is no truer test of the intelligence and good citizenship of a community than the character of its roads. In nearly every community throughout the country a good-roads movement has been inaugurated. Many of the States are building State highways and conducting experimental tests for good-road building, but the cry has come up for national aid. In the interior districts, away from the rivers, the people ask: "Why should the waterways be improved at national expense and not the highways?" The objection has been made heretofore that any movement in this direction upon the part of the Government would be an interference with the rights of the State; that the theory of State rights precluded the National Government from carrying into effect any enterprise of this kind. It has been suggested, however, that this objection may be overcome by the Government paying to the several States a proper compensation for the use of the roads in carrying the United States mails, this fund to be expended by the States. It pays the railroads for this privilege. Would it not be equally just to pay the States for the use of their highways over which the United States mails are carried? A bill has been introduced to this effect and, in my opinion, it is not only generous on the part of the United States Government, but also equitable and just. In many sections of the country the rural carriers are embarrassed by bad roads, and the cost of maintaining their horses and mail wagons is greatly increased thereby and time lost in the delivery of their mails. By improving the roads you increase the effectiveness of the service and decrease the expense. There is no branch of this Government more courteous, generous, and efficient than the Rural Free Delivery, and the carriers who go out daily to face the storms of winter and the heat of summer are no less courageous, hardy, and daring than the soldiers who face cannon's mouth. A soldier may never do battle in a lifetime, but the rural carrier contends with the elements every day in the year, and yet he is one of the poorest paid employees in all the Government service. When the parcel post comes his labors will be increased. The income of the Government will also be greatly increased, and, if not before, the rural carrier's salary should then share liberally in the general advance. Every fige brings new ideas, new suggestions, new theories, and a great many changes in the departments of the Government are suggested. These should be studied carefully and advances made slowly but surely. It is the duty of lawmakers in all cases like these to learn to reject the false and accept the true.

I hope to be able to vote upon the floor of this House for a general parcel-post bill-one that will carry with it more advantages, blessings, and comforts than any bill that has passed through Congress for many years.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have no time, but I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me long enough so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I asked publicly on the floor yesterday a question in regard to the meaning of section 8. Since that time I have asked other members of the committee, and I find that the other members of the committee agree with my construction of that language. I would like to ask the chairman if the intention is that the 12-cent rate shall apply to a package of 11 pounds originating on a rural free-delivery route and going to another free-delivery route, or originating, for instance, in Chicago and going to a rural free-delivery route in Illinois, or does it mean that it shall go only on the rural mail routes, and that when the package is delivered to the postmaster at the starting point of such rural free-delivery route then it shall take the additional rate over and above the 12 cents? Evidently the members of the committee differ very much in their construction of that language.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is much room for division. I do not think the committee would be split up on that question if fairly presented to them. The first section deals with a general parcel-post proposition. The first section deals with a general parcel-post proposition. It is general in its application.

Mr. HILL. Does it abolish the 16-cent rate?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It does not abolish the 16-cent rate. The existing law is an ounce law and this is a pound law. They are separate and distinct propositions, and neither conflicts with the other, in my opinion. I believe you can under this law send a package anywhere in the United States, whether you send it to a rural route from a city or from a rural route to a city, and that it will go for 12 cents a pound; but if you desire to avail yourself of the lower rate of 5 cents per pound, then it must be delivered on the rural route at the initial point or to a carrier on it for final delivery on that route.

Mr. HILL. Let me read the language of the second part of that section:

That on each and all rural mail delivery routes of the United States the postmaster at the starting point of such route shall until June 30, 1914, receive and deliver to the carrier or carriers of said routes all articles, parcels, or packages not prohibited to the mails by law and falling under the definition of fourth-class matter and not weighing in excess of 11 pounds, for transportation and delivery on said routes only, and the carriers shall receive at intermediate points on all rural routes such mail matter of the fourth class for delivery on their respective routes only.

Then it were an and given these vaters. New door not that

Then it goes on and gives those rates. Now, does not that bar out the 12-cent clause for the rural route?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The 12-cent clause operates on the rural route where the matter is sent from a point not on the route. In other words, if it is sent from a city to a city or from a city not the beginning of the route to a point on a rural route, the 12-cent rate applies, but if you desire to avail yourself of the lower rate, which is intended only to the application of a particular rural route, then you must deposit the matter in the post office or give it to some carrier on the route, otherwise it does not apply. This is one exception to the general proposition of fixing the 12-cent general rate.

I will state further that I have understood that the purpose of making it in this way was to give to the country storekeeper an advantage, which members of the committee thought he ought to have, over the mail-order houses a long distance away, and if the 12-cent rate does go to the rural free delivery route without an additional rate, why, of course, that advantage is taken away.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This bill is not intended to give any advantage to the merchant or to the farmer or to anybody else. The section to which the gentleman refers is to equalize the domestic with the foreign rate. It has been insisted, and properly so I think, that the American people ought to have the same benefit from the use of the mails as to the pound rate that the foreigner has. The pound rate is separate and distinct from the ounce rate, and that section is primarily for that purpose. It does not give any material benefit to the merchant or farmer; it is an equalization of rates for the purpose mentioned. The other section of the bill, the second section, is intended to create a commission to investigate and look into the parcel-post proposition and report as to the feasibility and propriety of establishing such an innovation on our postal system. Now the third section provides for this low rate on a particular route. It is and was confined to a particular route as an experiment, and it is limited to two years and by provision of law it ceases at that time, and the department can ascertain the workings of the rural delivery. It costs nothing, because the machinery for its operation is already in existence

Mr. HILL. Is not the language of the third section such as to bar out all other mail transportation except at that rate, so that that rate would be additional to the 12 cents?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, no; it refers to the general proposition-

Mr. HILL. It seems so to me.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield on that same question-

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Here is where I see trouble and I want to ask how the gentleman explains it? The section begins as follows:

That hereafter postage shall be paid on matter of the fourth class at the rate of 12 cents per pound.

Now, note this:

Except as herein provided.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. Mr. MURDOCK. Now, "except as herein provided" seems to relate necessarily only to the rural-route rates afterwards provided.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would not that reading of the law mean this sort of interpretation and application of the law, That a package sent from a town to another town and thence out to the farmer on a rural route would take two charges, namely, the 12 cent per pound charge from town to town and the rural-route charge in addition thereto to the farmer?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If a package was sent from one city to another and delivered, and then it was sought to send it from there to a rural route at the lower rate, that would be true.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, no; if the rating of this package was continuous would it not take two rates?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the rating of the package was from New York to a rural route in the State of Maryland, in my judgment, it would go straight for 12 cents.

Mr. HILL. Can not it be made clearer by any language? Mr. MOON of Tennessee. To me it is as clear as it possibly can be.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would it not be made clearer if you strike out the words "except as herein provided"?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Not at all. Mr. MURDOCK. What would happen if we would strike those words out? Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The exception that is provided here is for the rural route at the lower rate.

Mr. HILL. Would it not be made clearer if the gentleman should make it read this way:

That on each and all rural routes of the United States the post-master at the starting point of such route shall, until June 20, 1914, receive and deliver all fourth-class traffic originating on such route.

Would not that make it clearer?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If that makes it any clearer to the gentleman I shall have no objection to it, but it is clear enough now, I think.

Mr. HILL. I want it clear to the department so that it will

Mr. HTEL: I want It clear to the department so that regarding of into successful operation.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Lobeck].

Mr. Lobeck. Mr. Chairman, about a year ago I was asked by Mr. W. S. Delano, secretary of the Nebraska Farmers' Congress, of Nebraska, what position I would take on the parcelpost proposition. I answered the inquiry, and it was published on May 13 and circulated all over the country. It is as follows: on May 13 and circulated all over the country. It is as follows:

[Omaha (Nebr.) Bee.] (Special telegram.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 13.

humble or great, their home merchant has, in the great majority of cases, been the man who has lent a helping hand in time of need, often to his own detriment. It may be said that he was making a profit in the merchandise trade. He should, for he has assisted in every line or avenue of improvement for the welfare of this country.

"So there are two sides to every proposition, and I am willing to be shown before I am ready to support a resolution that vitally affects my neighbors and the people of Nebraska."

I have had some experience in a village store as a boy, in the State of Illinois, when I was hardly tall enough to look over the counter. My father and the other merchants of the village stayed by the pioneer in order to help him build up that

My father, before he became a merchant, as a pioneer farmer had to depend upon the country merchant and help him to develop his farm, just as everyone of his neighbors did.

As a youth I commenced my life work in a country store in Iowa as a clerk, and I know from experience that the pioneer farmers who came to Iowa and Nebraska to build up that country would have been in mighty hard shape if the local merchant had not stayed with him.

The village and small town merchant is opposed to the legislation known as parcel post and which is proposed to be passed in this House at this session. He believes that it will centralize trade into the large cities. He also believes, and has good reason to believe, that the parcel-post agitation with a flat rate in this country is being backed up by, and that the farmer has been educated to the demand by, the mail-order merchants of the large cities.

Mr. Delano, secretary of the Nebraska Farmers' Congress, wrote me and said it was not so. I had written him that the mail-order merchants were back of the agitation. It so happened that at the hearings in June, 1911, I listened to the testimony of a finely dressed gentleman from New York, and he was asked by Congressman Lloyd, chairman of the subcommittee, if any of the houses he represented were mail-order houses.

He said that two of them were in the mail-order business exclusively, and all the others did a large mail-order business. He was asked, as I recall it, why they were so anxious for parcel post. He said so that the countrymen and countrywomen might have the opportunity to purchase the latest styles of wearing apparel, and so forth, from the centers of fashion; so it was evident to me the reason t'e firms that he was representing were in the business was for gain and desired the assistance of the General Government to hold the trade, and, as his testimony proceeded, it was a self-evident fact. Therefore I was convinced by the evidence that I was correct in my statement that the mail-order houses were backing this parcel-post agitation. farmer has been educated to believe that a parcel-post system, if adopted by the Government in connection with the postal service, would be a panacea for all the evils, imaginary or otherwise, that now beset him. The magazine and periodical writers have been instilling this idea into his mind, telling him that he could reduce the cost of living by trading direct with the factory or first distributor, thereby saving the cost of the expense of the middle man.

One correspondent wrote me that the country merchant should go out and farm and help produce; another wrote me that we could do without the commercial traveling man. If that were so, what would become of the small town, the local consumers of the farmer's productions, and in no wise a small buyer of his products? The traveling man might go to farming, but then he would be a competitor, and he might be a very strong competitor, for many of the best traveling men we have in the country to-day were raised on farms and know something about the When I first commenced traveling, every village possessed a tavern; but when the traveling man came to spend his money the tavern of olden time was transformed into the modern hotel of to-day; and the modern hotel, whether in a small town or a large city, is a large consumer of farmer's products and helps to keep up the prices of what the farmer has kind, but cash. Would this mail-order house have been a help to these early settlers? They demanded cash for their mer-chandise and the farmer had no money to send them. These settlers would have starved to death had they been compelled to depend on the mail-order houses. Who stood by the country merchant? The traveling man and the jobber. The merchant had but small capital, the traveling man was the credit man, and on his representation the jobber and the manufacturer stood with him. So, hand in hand, the pioneer farmer and the pioneer merchant, the pioneer traveling man and the pioneer jobber have built up the Middle West. This Logan Valley that Jobber have built up the Middle West. This Logan Valley that I have called attention to is now one of the best cultivated and richest valleys on the earth, dotted with splendid towns and villages, with good schoolhouses, fine churches, and offers every comfort necessary to make life happy, and this has been made possible by the working together of these pioneers. Did any mail-order house lend a helping hand in this great work? they ever put a dollar into a church or a school or pay a cent of local taxation? Not that anybody has ever heard of.

I know something about traveling men from personal experience. When I had grown to manhood I became a commercial I remember well the pioneer merchants of western Iowa and all of Nebraska. The first trip I made into Nebraska was in 1875. Then there were but a few small towns. I recall visiting a hamlet in the Logan Valley, one of the prettiest countries in the world, where I sold merchandise to a small pioneer merchant who struggled along for years to make a living, and in that time there was not a settler in the valley, whether he lived in a dugout, a sod house, or frame shanty, that did not come to this merchant and get credit that he might live until his crops matured. These pioneers could not send to Montgomery Ward & Co., then already commencing a mail-order business in Chicago, and get their supplies; they had no money, and nothing ever goes with Montgomery Ward & Co., or their the traveling man is a menace to the business of the country.

So I am to-day standing with the small town, the village, the traveling man, and the country merchant, prime factors in the growth of our country, and I know that when the farmer takes a second thought and recalls the part that has been taken by the traveling man and country merchant in the development of our country he is not going to take favorably to this mail-order legislation that is promised as a panacea for all What is true of Logan Valley is also true of his troubles. all Nebraska and of every Western State, and this story that I have related can be repeated practically everywhere.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] asks the ques-The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] asks the question, "Who is this junta, working, with headquarters in Washington, against parcel post?" I think I can tell him. They are an organization of wholesale merchants in this country, representing a capital of $500,000,000 invested in every enterprise that helps to build up a country. They are assessed their full share of taxation, both for city, county, and State, wherever located. This American League of Associations, which the gentleman calls a junta, have for their special objects-

To organize, affiliate, and unite for harmonious cooperation local civic and commercial associations in the towns, villages, and small cities.

To check the absorption of trade and industry into a few great commercial and industrial centers and to guard against the evils resulting from the overgrowth of large cities.

To encourage the establishment of local industries and the investment at home of home capital, to promote good roads, and to foster all movements for educational and civic improve-

To assist the retail merchant and to cooperate with local associations in the protection and development of home trade.

To gather and prepare data, information, and literature relating to the above subjects and to maintain a publicity and lecture bureau for the purpose of arousing civic pride and to create, foster, and maintain a right public sentiment in favor of promoting the prosperity of the home town.

I know many of these firms personally, and they are the leading merchants of New York, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Louisville, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Omaha, St. Joseph, Kansas City, St. Paul, Duluth, Denver, San Francisco, Birmingham, Memphis, Atlanta, and, in fact, in every State in the Union. These firms represent a class of men in this country who have done much to aid in its development.

They are opposed to parcel post on a flat rate throughout the country, because it will centralize vital business into large cities and disrupt the entire system of business that it has taken nearly half a century to build up to a high-class manner of doing business and distributing goods throughout the country, and that will work great injury both to the manufacturer and the producing interests of this country to rearrange the methods of business. This association is compelled to have a secretary here in touch was the legislation; the men that are in favor of a parcel post have their organization represented here trying to secure legislation favorable to their views, and therefore these merchants must keep a bureau of information here; and I have no doubt that many Members in Congress are glad to receive information on matters pertaining to the welfare and interests of this country. These merchants have assisted every community in this country, and I think if the gentleman from Oregon had looked over the list of names of these merchants he would not have designated them as a junction these merchants are 500,000 commercial travelers. The these merchants are 500,000 commercial travelers. Why? he would not have designated them as a junta. Connected with cause it is intended to eliminate them by doing business through In fact, I think they have been advance couriers of prosperity and civilization in this new world. No trip has been too hard for the traveling man to take by team or train, and when he returned from these trips, my experience has been, and so has been the experience of other traveling men, those seeking new homes would inquire of them, and the traveling man would tell them where good locations could be found, and they could depend on him.

The traveling man is a walking encyclopedia of information in the territory that he travels in. They are the men that bring to the farmer, through his country merchant, the new inventions, the new tools, the new harvester, the agricultural implement. The traveling man shows the country merchant the new styles of women's wear and the qualities of goods. My first experience on the road was selling jeans and woolens for a Mississippi woolen mill just commencing business. The traveling salesman has helped make prosperity for the new South. Shortly thereafter I commenced selling hardware, and for 10 years I carried my samples to show a good hinge that some factory like the Stanley works were making; some good lock that Sargent, Corbin, or my friend Hml, of Connecticut, was manufacturing and introducing to the trade. If there was a new tool that had merit, or a new saw that had good quality of steel in it, or there was a new garden tool, I explained it to the country merchant, for we have improved in this country far above all other countries in manufacturing, as everyone knows. The implement traveling man assisted the country merchant in every way. He showed him the new harvester and the improved mower, the chilled steel plow, the cultivator, and every other article intended to help the farmer produce crops easier. These commercial traveling men have created competition among the wholesale houses. They have insisted on their buyers purchasing high-class goods at lowest prices to meet competition between themselves. The merchant has been benefited by it, and, finally, the consumer, the man who pays the bill, has been benefited by it. The traveling man, backed by his house, guarantees the quality of his wares to the country merchant; the country merchant in turn warranted them to the chant; the country merchant in turn warranted them to the farmer or consumer. Does a hammer prove defective; does an ax have a flaw; the merchant makes it good to the purchaser; the merchant or the farmer can always return it because it is warranted. The commercial traveler stood by the merchant; made good to him through his house. The mail-order house of to-day has copied the work of the traveling man, advertising it and put it into print. They state that they will guarantee their goods, but what does the guaranty amount to? It costs too much for the farmer or the mechanic to return it to them. If much for the farmer or the mechanic to return it to them. If they do, they have it inspected by some low priced or paid employee as to whether it was the fault of the farmer or the mechanic and whether he should be entitled to a new tool.

In every line of trade the commercial traveler has made good. He is also quite a consumer. He is a heavy buyer of farm products to-day, either directly or indirectly, either through his home or the hotel where he stops. It would make a good deal of difference to the farmer or gardener. If the traveling man should become a competitor in producing, he might become quite a competitor. The traveling man of to-day is opposed to parcel post, and so far as intelligence goes, they will compare favorably with any class of men. They are some of our best boys; they are the select salesmen of this country; and while they are not great money savers they are great money spenders, and that is what the farmer wants if he is going to get a good price for his products.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grego] stated the other day that it was to the benefit of the farmer to trade with the mail-order house, because the mail-order house buys goods in large lots and buys seconds to palm off on the American farmer. I do not think the Government should go into the business of assisting this mail-order house in palming off seconds on the farmer or mechanic. I do not think that is good business.

A good deal has been said here to-day about the cost of high living in the cities. May I suggest one of the causes of the high cost of living in the cities. Most of the people in cities live in flats or apartments. It is not convenient nor have they the room to lay in their supplies in such quantities as the farmer or the gardener would deliver to them, so they use the telephone—it is very handy—and they telephone to the grocery store on the corner if they want a package of yeast or a package of crackers or any other small article that they may need. It may not be worth more than a nickel, and they are in a hurry for it, and so it is delivered to them. The groceryman must have means of delivery, which consists of a vehicle of some kind, either a horse and wagon or an automobile. This adds to the cost of distribution in cities. I have no doubt that it has added 10 per cent to the cost of doing business in the small city. Before the days of the telephone, as, no doubt, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] well remembers, the town people and the farmers came to the stores, bought the goods, and carried the parcels away.

Now, if the local merchant has a general store in his city he has to deliver the goods all over the city or he can not maintain the trade of his customers, and what is true of Danville is also true of every city in our country. It costs the local merchant much more to carry on the business, and this adds to the cost of living.

The apartment and flat house are here to stay for reasons apparent to everyone who has any knowledge of the situation; the mechanic, the clerk, the laboring man must of necessity live as convenient and as near to their work as possible. This accounts for the crowded conditions in our cities to-day.

It has often been stated as an argument in favor of parcel post that the farmer and gardener would thereby have a convenient way of delivering his goods to the city. It does not appear to me that butter, when sent on a mail wagon over muddy or frozen roads or in the heat of summer, and carried by the rural-route carrier, would look very inviting or palatable to the housewife on its arrival. We can all imagine the appearance of a basket of eggs after coming into town on a rural wagon over rough roads. The gardener does business in a different way. He must of necessity bring his vegetables to market early in the morning if he is going to sell them, and the argument of delivering garden stuff, chickens, butter, and eggs does not appeal to anyone that has had experience in the business.

The express companies in this country, with their monopoly of trade and high charges, have had much to do with this agitation of parcel post. Their rates have been excessive, and I think it is about time the Government broke up this monopoly by taking it over and operating it with the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department is now in the parcel business, and so I am in sympathy with measures now before this House to take over the express business with its equipment and methods of distribution already formulated and operate it.

If the Government adopts a parcel-post system with a flat rate, I believe the loss to the Government the first year will amount to more than the cost of acquiring the express companies. The Government could operate the express business without a loss and, in my opinion, reduce the cost of shipping parcels and express matter throughout the country 50 per cent and still have no deficiencies.

I was told when a small lad that the best way to destroy weeds was to pull them up by the roots, and I believe the best way to destroy this monopoly is to remove the cause, and that can be done by taking over the express companies, and the Government should be able to secure as good contracts with the railroad companies for carrying parcels as the express companies are enjoying now.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I am in favor of any system, whatever name it may be called, parcel post or parcel express, with a distance rate of charge. Then the merchant in the large city or small town, the mechanic, the laboring man, the farmer, and the clerk would be on an equal basis as to the cost of transportation, and no one class of people in this country would be benefited alone, and we would continue to develop this country better than ever. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Pepper].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, the particular subject which I wish to discuss this evening has not very much to do with the Post Office appropriation bill, although it has a great deal to do with the administration of the Post Office Department. Since I have been attending this session of Congress I have received a large number of complaints relating to the belated delivery of second-class mail. During the winter months, owing to storms, and so forth, it seemed to me that there was possibly a fairly good excuse for the failure of the Post Office Department to properly deliver the newspapers and the other second-class mail that is now delivered in large quantities through the Post Office Department. But from my information on the subject I am advised that the same condition as to the delivery of second-class mail exists now as has existed during the winter months.

I have before me the statements of men, subscribers to the newspapers of the land, to the effect that their newspapers very frequently have come to them one or two or three days late. One instance in particular is that of a man who lives on the main line of a railroad about 18 miles from the county seat, where I live, who makes the complaint that his daily newspaper, that ought to reach him on the same day that it is published, comes to him two or three days late, and then a number arrive at the same time in a bundle tied up with a string.

I mention that simply as an illustration of complaints that have become very frequent among the people who are interested in the service of the post office. I have been trying to find out why this is so. I have been trying to ascertain if there is any particular reason why this complaint should come now, rather than at some other time; whether conditions at this time are any different than in the past. To do this I have read the hearings before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads on this bill, and have sought information from other sources, including testimony from men engaged in the postal service.

The numerous reports received of trains arriving at their terminals with large quantities of mail that the clerks were unable to distribute en route emphasizes the demoralized condition into which our postal service has been forced through a false policy of economy. From letters and other evidence in my possession it would seem that the West and Northwest have suffered most from delays in the delivery of the mails on account of this policy to reduce the force and the facilities below the needs of the service.

As an illustration I would insert in the records the following report of one crew on one train on the main line between Chicago and Minneapolis.

This crew reports carrying unworked mails into Minneapolis as follows:

s follows:

December, 1910, 1,597 packages of letters, 59 sacks of papers.

January, 1911, 213 packages of letters, 113 sacks of papers.

February, 1911, 118 packages of letters, 41 sacks of papers.

March, 1911, 2,315 packages of letters, 244 sacks of papers.

April, 1911, 40 packages of letters, 17 sacks of papers.

May, 1911, 54 sacks of papers.

Six crews alternate on this train so that it is reasonable to assume that the total amount of unworked mail carried into Minneapolis on this one daily train is about six times the above figures during the time indicated.

During the past month (March, 1912) this same train carried into the terminal unworked, approximately-

It would be interesting to know the total amount of unworked mail carried into the Twin Cities by that line since this policy of economizing at the expense of efficient service was inaugurated, and what the average delay in the delivery of the mail has been.

This is the concrete example of the conditions on one line. The same conditions, according to reports received, prevail on all of the heavier lines of the country, with the resultant delay in the mails and the consequent detriment to the interests of the patrons of the service.

Local officials are obliged to impose extra-duty schedules and overtime upon the regular clerks to dispose of the accumulation, in proof of which I beg to insert the following copies of official orders in the records: GENERAL NOTICE.

There seems to have been such a great demand for economy

There seems to have been such a great demand for economy in the Post Office Department, such a great effort to reduce the expenses, so that they could make some sort of a showing at the end of this fiscal year, that the Postmaster General has seen fit to work the postal employees overtime, on long runs, and to cut down their force, so as to make it impossible properly to handle the business of the department.

It seems to me that the Post Office Department, if it is anything to the American people, ought to mean a department that renders service. I do not believe there is any great demand in this country for this so-called economy at the expense of efficient service. It does seem to me that if there is one department in this Government that should be close to the people, a department that should be able to render real service to the American people, it is the Post Office Department; and I believe the people are entitled to the best service, the highest kind of service, in the delivery not only of the first-class mail, but also of the second-class mail.

Take, for example, the farmers in the various communities. Oftentimes the delivery of the farmer's newspaper is of the most vital importance. It brings to him the news of the most vital importance. markets, and all the various items that are of vital importance to the farmers and the men who live in the smaller towns.

I say that we are entitled to the most efficient service of this department, and I am not in sympathy with any proposition that this Post Office Department, in order to make a record of economy—a fake record, I pronounce it, because it is not real economy—should sacrifice the interests of the people and impose unjust burdens on employees.

I hope that there may be found some way of reaching the administration of this department, so that the people may at least secure reasonable service in the handling and distribution of their mail. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

[Mr. FINLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Lobeck].

Mr. Lobeck, Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the Members of this House that I am in favor of the zone or distance rate in relation to the parcel post, postal express, or whatever it may be termed. That puts the merchant and the farmer on an equal basis. Any law that establishes a zone or distance rate that will lower the cost of carrying parcels I am in favor of. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department, in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I move that the committee do now rise.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 14, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. Taggart as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, glorify the service which brings us together on this penceful Sabbath day by Thy holy presence, that we may be purified, exalted, ennobled.

We thank Thee for the life, character, and achievements of the Member in whose memory we are assembled. Grant that they may be written in characters of light on the pages of history, that others may read and be inspired to useful and noble lives. We mourn his loss, but are comforted in the thought that he still lives in some higher, to the east whom he this the solace to the bereaved wife and to those to whom he was bound by the ties of kinship:

"For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 13, 1912, was read and approved.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have asked that the usual business of the House be suspended to-day for the sad purpose of paying a last tribute to a former Member of this House, EDMOND H. MADISON.

Judge Madison was born in Illinois in 1865. He came of a sturdy and religious stock. His father and mother had been pioneers in a new country. They knew by experience what it was to come in contact with plain and hard conditions. Judge Madison inherited from his parents a rugged character. He had decisive notions about the duties of a citizen. He was plain in his tastes, honest in his beliefs, modest in his ambitions, and decidedly practical in all his methods. I have rarely known a man in public life who had a more accurate idea of the duties of a man in high station than Congressman Madison.

He came here from the bench. There he had exercised the authority of a judge. On the bench he was in action every day. He was the central figure in the court. His opinions were announced from the time the court convened in the morning until it adjourned in the evening, and were only subject to reversal or revision by the supreme court. It is said of his judgments that they were usually right. This mode of life for a number of they were usually right. This mode of life for a number of years gratified that ambition that most men of ability and capacity possess.

He entered the House of Representatives, as I say, after a long service on the bench. He was more or less disappointed in the first few months of his service here. There was a lack of that exercise of power and authority to which he had been accustomed on the bench. He talked about it freely. I do not violate any confidences when I say that he often talked of quitting Congress and again resuming the practice of the law, with the ultimate idea of once more ascending the bench. But, being conscientious in the performance of his duties here, as elsewhere, he devoted himself to his work, and, one step after another, he found himself becoming more and more interested in and connected with the work of the House. I do not say what I am about to say in disparagement of any man who enters this House as a new Member; but it is rare that a man with so short a service as Edmond H. Madison has acquired the position in this House that he had at the hour of his death.

On the 18th day of September last ED. MADISON, in his home in Dodge City, arose at the usual hour and apparently in his usual health. He had been enjoying a few weeks with his friends and his constituents throughout the district. Everywhere he was met with their plaudits and a cordial approval of his public career. He was having commendation not only from his own district and State but from the people throughout the entire country. It is needless to say in this condition of public attitude toward him he felt serene as to his political future. The future looked exceptionally bright.

He was happy among his people and had the confidence and esteem of them all. He was especially devoted to his wife and children—a devotion they fully returned—and on the morning of his untimely death, within three minutes before he expired, he was playing joyfully and gleefully, romping about the house, with a grandchild. The morning meal was announced, he seated himself in his usual place at the table, a few words of conversation were exchanged, and in an instant his head dropped forward, and before his wife could reach his side life had gone and EDMOND H. Madison entered the portals of death.

He had a hope that reaches beyond this life. He came not only from a rugged stock, but a religious stock, and with him we all indulge the hope in which he indulged, that in some other sphere he is to-day fulfilling the mission of his life.

Whatever is so universal as death must be a blessing.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, as his former associates and friends in this House we meet to-day to pay a last tribute of respect to the memory of Edmond H. Madison. It is fitting ves: more; it is a sacred duty-that we who knew him whose name is now enrolled amongst the dead should bear public testimony to his qualities and character.

Some have spoken and others may speak of their long acquaintance with him, of his private life, and professional career prior to his service in Congress, but I did not know him till I met him here on the opening day of the Sixtleth Congress; and what I shall say must be based upon my information of him obtained since that time.

But, Mr. Speaker, since our acquaintance began few, if any, had better opportunities to observe the character of his private life or to know better than I the value of his public services. We entered Congress together, and with our respective families lived at the same hotel in this city during the sessions of the House. We at once became warm friends, and frequently enjoyed friendly, social, and confidential intercourse.

Judge Madison was an honest, industrious, and a faithful Representative of his constituents. To serve them well and acceptably was his paramount purpose and his highest ambition, and to the fact that he succeeded well I, as his friend of a sister State, am glad to add to-day my testimony to that of his friends and colleagues of his own State.

By his industry and his close attention to his official duties he soon became recognized as one of the useful Members of the House, and by reason of his ability, sound judgment, and forcefulness in debate he later became a recognized leader of the House. His originality of thought, his independence of action, and his fearlessness in defending his position and in advocating the principles for which he stood won alike the confidence, the admiration, and the respect of both his political friends and

I trust it will not be considered inappropriate for me to state that in the last extended conversation I had with him he very earnestly expressed his profound regret that the wing of the Republican Party of which he was a leader, known as "Insurgents," had failed to embrace what he believed was their greatest opportunity for exerting an important influence in constructive legislation and statesmanship when they failed to stand as a body by President Taft in his advocacy of the Canadian reciprocity bill. That was soon after its passage by Congress, and was, of course, before it was known or expected that it would be defeated by the Canadian Government.

Judge Madison's death, instantaneous as it was, came as a shock to us all, but to none with such bitterness and grief as to his own devoted family in his own home, among whom, without a moment's warning, he was stricken down and transferred from the bright and cheerful expressions of animation and life to the cold and mysterious silence of death.

Former Senator Vest, one of the greatest men, if not the greatest, that Missouri has ever produced, once said over the grave of a departed friend, "Every death is a tragedy." If the ordinary death from natural causes, after a lingering illness of days or weeks, is a tragedy, as the great Senator declared, how much more tragical was the sudden and unexpected demise of our friend Judge Madison, who, in the midst of health, happiness, and hope, was suddenly stricken down by the cruel hand of death.

I attended the funeral of Judge Madison at his former home in Dodge City, Kans., and witnessed there the unmistakable evidences of the high place he held in the confidence and in the hearts of his home people. The entire city was in mourning, the business houses were all closed, the schools dismissed, and 4,000 school children lined the streets to join in the universal expression of sorrow as his body was borne to and from the church. Sadness filled the hearts of all the people, and many of them wept as they spoke of the distinguished dead.

The citizens there-men, women, and children-all knew him and usually spoke of him as "ED" MADISON, which to some might have seemed disrespectful, but to those of us who live in smaller cities or communities such familiarity is not repulsive, and especially to those of us who live among the associates of childhood and the friends of a lifetime, as such familiarity rather bears with it the priceless message of old and true friendship, the ties of which have grown stronger with the years of intimate association, joint responsibilities, and mutual sympathies.

In this age of the world the tendencies of the aspiring and ambitious seems to be to seek homes and fortunes in the great cities and the great centers of population, but I have often thought, and am prone now to believe, that the smaller city or community is preferable as an ideal home; and as I witnessed the great respect shown to the memory of Judge Madison by his former neighbors and friends, as I heard them speak of the great value of his life work and his influence for good, and as I heard the beautiful expressions of their confidence and love for him in life and of their deep sorrow and the realization of the great loss they had sustained in his death, I was again deeply impressed with the belief that life in our smaller cities is not without its adequate compensation.

Judge Madison was prominent and influential as a citizen; he was able and just as a lawyer and a judge; he was an honest and a faithful Representative in Congress; he was active in his support of his home churches, local lodges, and schools; he was a kind and affectionate husband, a loving and indulgent father, and left to his family the priceless inheritance of a spotless name. His life was an inspiration to the youth of the land, and his noble traits of character were worthy of the emulation of us all. His home people, who knew him best, loved him; they honored him in life and now all mourn his death, and we, his former associates in this House, join with them in praising his many virtues and in revering his memory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, in rising in my place to pay my weak tribute to the memory of Judge Madison I am performing a duty more painful than any that has been my lot since I have been a Member of this House. Of all my treasured friendships here his was the nearest and the dearest. I knew his ambitions. I knew his hopes. I knew his fears. I learned to respect him for searching wisdom, to admire him for his unflinching honesty, and to love him for his fearless courage. From abject poverty he struggled on until his master mind had placed him among the leaders of men who stand for nobler things, for higher ideals. In his great heart he felt the piercing cry of struggling mortals. With wisdom as his guiding star, with justice as his spear, with honor as his shield, and with mercy as his watchword he plunged into every struggle with a dauntless courage, utterly regardless of his own safety or his own welfare. His country was his idol, his conscience was his master, and humanity was his god. He never hesitated to defend what he believed to be right, and he always denounced evil wherever he found it. He believed-

To sin by silence when we should protest
Makes cowards out of men. The human race
Has climbed on protest. Had no voice been raised Against injustice, ignorance, and lust,
The inquisition yet would serve the law
And guillotines decide our least disputes,
The few who dare must speak, and speak again,
To right the wrongs of many.

The story of his life is a glowing tribute to courage and fidelity. No man in public life was better fitted to perform our country's service. He knew the struggles of the poor. His heart responded to every pulse beat of the honest citizen. He sympathized with humanity's just demands against the heartless claims of avarice and greed, and his analyzing mind was able to solve all the perplexing problems of government and of state. Beneath our flag there was no place of honor and of trust that he could not have filled with distinction and with credit. He served our country well, but his service and his life redounded to the betterment of humanity everywhere. But in the midst of his usefulness, in the strength of his magnificent manhood, with his task yet uncompleted, with his work yet unfinished, he was stricken down without warning and without notice. His death almost brings to our mortal minds a doubt of the wisdom and the justice of Providence.

Oh how strangely the course of nature tells,
By her small heed of earthly suffering,
That she was fashloned for a happier world.
Or is it not better to say that it all reminds us of an immortality, a future life, where the pains and ills of mortal man are lost in the realms of eternal bliss; an immortality where-

No grief shall gnaw the heart, And never shall a tender tie be broken.

Weeping for the death of one so great, so faithful, and so true, we stand upon the shore of the silent river, and with mortal, tearful eyes we strive in vain to pierce the mists that rest upon its bosom and that enshroud the silent boatman and our departed friend upon his voyage to the unseen shore. And as we watch and wait the listening ear can hear the muffled dipping sound of the returning oar. At our tired feet the breaking of the rippling waves upon the sands reminds us that soon from out those mists there will be seen the determined face of the ever-returning boatman bearing a summons that we must obey. While we are waiting on this shore we can best honor the memory of our brother who is waiting on the other shore by always bravely fighting what is wrong and defending what is right, by courageously exposing and condemning wickedness and crime and honoring and protecting honesty and truth, and by being grateful to our Creator, true to our country, and merciful to all humanity, so that when our summons comes it may be said of us, as I now say of him-

One who never turned his back, but marched abreast forward;
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph;
Held we full to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake!

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, when one thinks of the death of our late colleague there irresistibly comes to his memory the familiar lines from the favorite poem of Lincoln:

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud? Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud, A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave. Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

I have not had an opportunity to prepare that eulogy of our late colleague which his conspicuous merit not only justifies, but demands. It was my good fortune from the beginning of his service here to be thrown in close official and personal contact with him. We served together on the Committee on Insular Affairs, on the special committee appointed to investigate the Sugar Refining Co. and others, and had begun our service together as members of the Committee on Rules.

Of course, it is in the committee service, after all, that we have here the best opportunities for observing and measuring our colleagues, and from the beginning I was impressed with the splendid ability of this splendid man. A part of the service on Insular Affairs during the time that we served together was devoted to the investigation of the public-land administration in the Philippine Islands. In that investigation, as later in the Sugar Refining Co. investigation, I was impressed with the tremendous force of the man as a lawyer, and, of course, was impressed there, as we were always impressed here on the floor of the House and everywhere we met him, with the fairness and sense of justice that animated him.

Courage, candor, and courtesy were all blended in this man, and added to these were the superb intellect, the intuitive, in-stinctive grasp of public questions, and all these necessarily rendered him a leader among men. He would have been a leader in any body of men anywhere in the world. He had all the elements of leadership.

had some opportunities to observe his family relations. I think it would not be possible to find in any home in this country or elsewhere a tenderer, sweeter, gentler affection than that which existed in the home and family of our lamented colleague. When he died his State suffered a distinct loss. When he died this country suffered a distinct loss. He was a man of ability; he was a man of absolute candor, and of vast and magnificent courage, and the Commonwealth or the country which loses a man who possesses these elements, coupled with the distinct ability which was possessed by Judge Madison, suffers a great less, no matter what his partisan political affiliations may chance to be.

As I said in the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to prepare that eulogy which I should have liked to prepare for delivery upon this occasion, but I should have felt that I had not done right if, after the close and pleasant relations which existed between our lamented colleague and myself. I had failed to at least appear here to voice my appreciation of his life and splendid character.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, during my term of service many an admirable Member of this House has passed away, many an old friend has left us behind. And yet until to-day I have never unasked composed a eulogy. Such is the difficulty of formulating new words of praise that we all, as I believe, shrink from the reiteration of the many times told tale of affection and respect.

I am sadly aware that I can not satisfy even myself by any words which I may speak, still for all that I have asked permission to record my sober grief for Madison's decease, my solemn pride in Madison's remembrance.

Leadership in this House is not to be gained in a day, it is not to be gained by eloquence, it is not to be gained through favoritism, nor is it to be gained by good-fellowship. Long service, industry, thoroughness, learning, all help to make the leader; yet all these advantages together are nothing in the balance as compared with the one greatest quality of courage. When I see a Member of this House grasp a flaming brand which I do not dare to grasp, that Member can lead me. Madison tested and he was not found wanting. Madison was an insurgent, Madison was a progressive, but he was an insurgent and a progressive from conviction; not because in-surgency and progressive views were popular. All this I know, because I saw Madison's courage tried and proved. With a struggle for reelection in front of him, with an active labor vote in his district, I saw him arise in his place and I heard him condemn a labor measure which he believed to be wrong. There was everything for him to lose, nothing for him to gain. And yet, if in some happy hunting ground his spirit is conscious of our homage to-day, he must know that at least he gained the steadfast respect of a fellow man.

The Persians believe that for three days after the death of a good man the soul lingers close to his life-long friend, the body. On the fourth day the soul ascends in the company of his guardian angel to render his account at the gate of "Chinvat Bridge." In his upward journey, floating on the soft south wind, he meets his own astral self transformed into an entrancing figure of seraphic beauty. This figure reveals itself to him as the embodiment of his own good thoughts, good words, and good deeds.

Oh, if the Persian creed be true, with how transcendent a beauty must Madison's astral self have dazzled his pure white soul!

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker: We know not what the future hath Of marvel or surprise; Assured alone that life and death, His mercy underlies.

I regard it as a sad privilege to assist in writing into the permanent records of this House a tribute that shall help to garland as with evergreens and adorn as with immortelles the memory of the life of EDMOND H. MADISON, and with his colleagues to stand uncovered in recognition of the real good of life as lived by him. On occasions like this we labor for suitable phrases and struggle for adequate sentences to do justice to such a life, and they come not-then it is that the impotency of words becomes apparent.

His colleagues may miss him in this Chamber, but Kansas most of all, for her people deeply mourn the great loss. Among the noted men of the Nation whom we all cherish Kansas, his beloved Commonwealth, has contributed many, among whom was the great commoner, the constructive statesman, the man of the people, Senator Preston B. Plumb, and that other eminent statesman, the matchless orator and master of the English language, who polished every word that fell from his lips until it reflected new meaning, embellished every phrase with increasing luster, and electrified every sentence with irresistible energy, and before whom every adversary trembled in debate, whose power and diguity is but feebly portrayed by the artist as seen in another hall of this Capitol. Senator John J. Ingalls; and to-day the country looks at that splendid galaxy and sees an added star, no less henored, no less loved, and no less bril-liant in service to country and humanity than they.

It is said that life is a mystery and that death is simple and natural, yet the latter is always impressive. It has also been truthfully said that the span of life is marked by springtime and autumn, for if we will but lift up our eyes and behold under the shining canopy this day, we will see nature blossoming forth everywhere with verdure, life, and beauty. The green blades are coming forth, the buds are opening, the flowers are blooming, and all is radiant with the mystery of life; and in the last analyses the philosopher explains it not. Travel on until the chills of autumn are reached, with eyes earthward turned, and behold the leaf is seared, the blade is no more, the bud is gone, and the flower is dead upon the stock; and all along the pathway, from spring to autumn, here and there, prematurely, blades decay, buds fail to open, flowers bloom no more, and great trees of the forest wither and die in midsummer; so it is in the pathway of human life, where, without a single note of alarm, our colleague fell by the wayside before the allotted time of man.

Life is often called a voyage-a journey from shore to shore. If so, his was but half completed, for the full-freighted bark, with all its precious cargo, suddenly went down in midocean.
"If a man die, shall he live again?" was the absorbing problem of the race for centuries.

The solemn singers and their songs,
The shrouded dead, the bier and pall;
Oh, death, mankind has waited long
To know if death shall end it all!

And the answer did not come until a voice on the Judean hills was heard to say, "I am the resurrection and the life."

Invert the torch and quench the light, And let the darksome tomb enthrall; The star of hope gleams through the night; Oh, loving hearts, death is not all.

There is no death; the stars go down, To rise upon some other shore, And bright in heaven's jeweled crown They shine for evermore.

Sharing the conviction entertained in nearly every breast, consciously or otherwise, that "man is immortal until his work is done," and being impressed with the magnitude of the burden resting upon his broad and untiring shoulders, and believing that public duty should not be at the mercy of those who gauge everything from the standard of selfishness and ambition, but that politics should be a science and not a scramble, he did not hesitate to undertake any task however great in the interests of his people and State. As he toiled on, his hosts of admiring friends never even suspected any weakness to be lurking in his apparently robust physique which would soon end all, and dispel their fond dreams that his career would go on for years to come.

Born of a lineage which has given a President to the country, reared by a godly father and mother in a home where luxury and idle hands were not supposed to have a place and where all understood and obeyed the divine law to go forth and earn bread by the sweat of the brow, he toiled at whatsoever his hands found to do, and was not ashamed of the grime of his hands or the garb of the laborer, but esteemed each the badge of honor in the sight of God, whom he early learned to love and serve as the whole duty of man. As a Christian, his faith and life were of the stalwart, sustained, even-going order which neither time nor season nor environment in anywise affected. He was unusually familiar with the Book and the hymnology of the church, and, while not pretentiously pious or demonstrative, he could repeat the Book and sing the old familiar songs of the church with such ability that those who heard were charmed with the sincerity of his devotion to the God taught him by a sainted father and mother.

As a youthful country school-teacher, the first rung up the ladder that has raised thousands up this country's true loyally to positions of loftiest eminence, and that marked the way of the martyred Garfield from the towpath to the Presidency, he was himself a student, a scholar, and instructor.

From school-teacher he passed to law student and then to practitioner at the bar, where he soon found recognition as an able, trustworthy attorney, one in whom clients could place implicit confidence and whom courts from highest to lowest would hear, and to whom they gave full weight of considera-tion, respect, and accord. Chosen to the office of county attorney, he became the terror of evildoers and lawbreakers in his community, restoring order where lawlessness had reigned, bringing decency in place of dissipation, and a higher and cleaner civilization, which remains to this day.

Elevated to the judgeship of the district court, he pursued the same thoroughgoing course, and no man ever wore the judicial ermine with more dignity and credit to himself or satisfaction to the lovers of law and justice.

From the court, where he so evenly balanced the scales of justice between man and man, he was called by a confiding people to the greatest legislative body in the civilized world, people to the greatest legislative body in the civilized world, where he exchanged the quiet of the courtroom to the fiercest forum in debate among men. Of his going in and coming out and service in this Chamber his colleagues are familiar. Of his life it may be truthfully said that he was singularly honest, conscientious, and upright in all his ways; clean clear through to his soul; modest as a child, but bold as a hero. He was always active, and performed with courage every duty that fell to his lot better than expected, and never disappointed; he was strong in thought, clear in statement, logical in argument, and was ever mindful of the feelings of others, never stooping to innuendoes or biting sarcasm to humiliate an opponent at the expense of the dignity of debate.

He was therefore a wielder of mighty influence and the builder of a character so strong and towering that it commanded the profound respect and admiration of all with whom he came in contact:

The purest treasure mortal times afford Is spotless reputation; that away, Men are but guilded loam or painted clay; A jewel in a ten times barred up chest Is a right spirit in a loyal breast; Mine honor is my life; both grew in one; Take honor from me and my life is done.

Antony's saying that "the evil men do lives after them," if true, would leave such men as Edmond H. Madison without memory among men. But it is not true. The good men do is their monument, and it lasts forever.

The heritage that he has left us in his flawless character and unsullied reputation, and the love and esteem in which he came to be held, not only by his colleagues but at home and abroad, is a more coveted distinction than the gift of the greatest office in the land and comes to the country in these times with a peculiar and indescribable benediction, the memory of which will be as pleasant as the murmur of a low fountain stealing forth in the midst of roses or the soft, sweet accents of an angel's whisper in the bright dreams of innocence.

EDMOND H. MADISON is gone, and we may long For the touch of a vanished hand And the sound of a voice that is still;

and we are disappointed, yet somewhere, somehow, we feel there is a shoreless beyond, where no shadows fall, which is cooled by the perfume of Eden's flowers of every hue, that can not wither and shall not fade, and in that realm he has found that restful employment so beautifully described by Kipling: that restful employment so beautifully described by Kipling:
When Earth's last picture is painted and the tubes are twisted and dried,
When the oldest colors have faded, and the youngest critic has died,
We shall rest and, faith, we shall need it—lie down for an zon or two,
Till the Master of All Good Workmen shall set us to work anew.
And those that were good shall be happy; they shall sit in a golden chair;
They shall splash at a ten-lengue canvas with brushes of comet's hair;
They shall find real saints to draw from—Magdalene, Peter, and Paul;
They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all.
And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame,
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as he sees It for the God of Things as They Are.

MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, over and above his great qualities, he was splendid in mental equipment, strong in conviction, quick in perception, alert to the inspirations of debate, and vigorous in his advocacy of a cause—there was another element in the late Edmond Madison which made the high place attained by him in public affairs remarkable. For while the attributes which Mr. Madison possessed in superlative degree bring men into prominence congressionally, we know the process is usually slow. With Mr. Madison the attainment was rapid. He had but two terms in Congress. Yesterday he was a stranger here; to-day known of all men. Quickly as he ascended, he was sure in every step upward, and there was no man's future in public life, before the black curtain fell between him and its splendors, more certain than his.

I remember his youth, for his start in life was in my country. Thirty years ago he was teaching school near Wichita-busy with the minds of an interesting group of children in Cook's schoolhouse, a red brick building, small, squat, solitary, and asleep in the sunshine beside a dusty prairie road. Eventually he came to town and studied law in the office of a pioneer, G. W. C. Eventually he Jones, and when admitted to the bar he moved westward to Dodge City, where he rose quickly in public place and popular esteem from county attorney to district judge, from district judge to Congressman.

From the very beginning of his career he loved a campaign. The rostrum inspirited him. Happiness was his at the soldiers' reunions, at the harvest picnics, and before the critical audiences that gather in the court rooms in the smaller towns of western Kansas. And in a State convention, in a nominating speech, he won early in his career a reputation that soon became State wide.

This gift of speech in him, and the joy of him in it, he brought to Washington and to Congress with some fear. We have talked often about it. His first speech here was a success, and from that moment his rise in Congress was signal. And yet that moment was to him, as it must be to all, one of anxiety and of quickening pulse—an ordeal. Yet the success of his first effort here, besides revealing to the membership the presence of a new strong mind, was in a way an epitome of his correct and so for as a single individual can reflect it the his career, and, so far as a single individual can reflect it, the ever-recurring, fascinating story of the democracy, as it is developed at every session of Congress.

The House is never the sum of the individuals who compose it; it is in its aggregate something more, something less, and something quite different. It seems at times as elemental in its emotional equipment as a child, as quick in its reactions, as instinctive and as funciful. If the mood be upon it, the House, in appreciative and responsive attention, can be the most subtly flattering of audiences, and it can be also unspeakably cruel and refined in applying the torture of its indifference. The 390 men, in this ability to listen sympathetically, are as any other audience similar in size; but the 390 men, as an audience that listens for a moment to a new Member and rejects the speaker, often without reason, displays a cruelty impossible in any ordinary audience or, indeed, in any one of the individuals

A new Member of Congress ordinarily recognizes the capacity of the House for this unconscious cruelty. He is also impressed and oppressed, as a rule, with the thought that the House is highly sensitive to first impressions and tenacious of them, once His whole future, it often seems to him, may be wrecked upon a single effort.

There is, then, an added wreath to the victory of the first speech here when the idle glance the House turns at the sound of a strange voice evolves slowly from curiosity into interest and from interest into eager attention. There are many manifestations in this group of men who congregate under the rule of a restless and unavailing gavel, but there is none so close to a miracle as the marvelous silence of the noisy House when its interest commands silence. He who wins that silence by his eloquence, his logic, his information, has won a victory. There is no denying its sweetness.

Our colleague, Mr. Madison, won it in his first speech-one dealing with the writ of injunction, a difficult subject-and he never sued for attention again in vain.

He won it by a certain remarkable gift, strongly evident in this speech—in fact, in all his longer addresses here—the gift of clarity of statement. If there be a technical definition for this in dialectics, I do not know it, but Mr. Madison had a method of weaving his argument into the fine fabric of his statement with such skill that an opponent who granted any part of the premise was liable to be taken into camp, bound hand and foot. I have not seen this gift in anyone in the degree hand and foot. I have not seen this gift in anyone in the degree in which Mr. Madison possessed it, here or elsewhere. It will be remembered by those who listened to his speeches on the writ of injunction, on the corporation tax, and on the rules of the House.

In the possession of this particular gift and what he wrought here with it, and his other attributes revealed in the consideration and debate of public questions, is the story of democracy as we see it unfold here day by day, as our friend Madison saw it and eagerly shared in its development. Since any one of us has been in Congress the personality of Mr. Manson stands distinct. That personality has not been repeated, and will not be. His type had not gone before and it will not come again. No two Congresses are alike. Each differs from its predecessors and from its successors. And this is as much because of the change of membership as of the change in political issues. The forms and usages of Congress—indeed, the brevity of tenure alone—would seem to doom all who come to be reshaped in a certain monotonous mold. But character, temperament, individuality persist. The variation of types the House shows is endless, and this circumstance changes the complexion of Congresses, and in the curious intermingling of personality and issue in debate gives color to the one and identity to the other; for in the House, as on the hustings, we personify our principles and look once at the platform and twice at the candidate.

Mr. Madison was of the strong individualistic type. This was his characteristic and the roots of it ran far back. As he was, so were his forebears. They were pioneers. The fiber of self-reliance they gave him he strengthened. Noble in impulse, gentle and just in counsel, kindly in controversy, there was a certain largeness in his vision and broadness in his convictions that clothed him with extraordinary power among his colleagues. That power grew with its exercise and was making for Mr. Madison, when he passed suddenly from among us, a more and more brilliant future in national life.

His district was the country of earth and sky-prairies that stretch floor-flat far to the unbroken circle of the horizon; a sky unobstructed and undiminished, answering to the magnitude and majesty of the plains. He loved the spell of the prairies. He longed often, when we talked together here in Washington, for the restful silence of the country that brings in its very monotony of landscape a man into closer relations with the profundities and nearer nature and nature's God.

He has passed on quickly from among us into the shadows where for each of us a grave is hidden. From out the dark there comes to us no guiding cry. Yet from somewhere in the silences, the silences that lie between the quick and the dead, sounds the earnest that is higher than hope, deeper than belief, the earnest that echoes always in the soul of the quick-that the dead live—the earnest that the spirit of our friend, the character it adorned, are and can not be of time, the earnest that they are and must be of eternity.

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 3607.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 3607) to give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to certain organizations or persons in the suit of the United States against the Tobacco Co. and others

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, during the debate on Saturday I was asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] in what manner and to what extent the circuit court in New York had approved or adjudicated the plan of reorganization. In the hurry of the moment, I omitted to read one paragraph of the decree which reflects much light upon the subject of that inquiry, and I beg now to read it:

This court having heard the parties as directed by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is further ascertained and determined and ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plan hereinbefore set forth is a plan or method which, taken with the injunctive provisions hereinafter set forth, will dissolve the combination heretofore adjudged to be illegal in this cause, and will re-create out of the elements now composing it a new condition which will be honestly in harmony with, and not repugnant to, the law, and without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plan as hereinabove set forth be, and it is hereby, approved by this court, and the defendants herein are, respectively, directed to proceed forthwith to carry the same into effect.

I do not make any additional comment upon this part of the decree, because it is almost a repetition of portions which I read on Saturday; but this extract shows clearly that the circuit court in New York intended to give its sanction and its approval, and, in so far as it could, to adjudicate the lawfulness of the plan which I have already discussed.

Mr. President, the debate on Saturday developed certain differences of opinion with regard to the law of the case; and it is to the law of the case that I especially now desire to direct my attention. In view of the debate on Saturday I ask the Senators present-and I carnestly hope that they will-to give me their attention for a few moments, and especially the lawvers among them, to a further brief analysis of the law of the bill now under consideration.

I admit that the moment the case is stated instinctively we assume an attitude, if not of opposition, at least an attitude of Why? Because the bill is both special and retro-It operates on things done and a status already created. Such legislative action is rarely necessary, and therefore rarely If I have not established the imperative need of the legislation, it is useless to go further, for no ordinary circumstances will justify this measure. I desire that admission to be fully understood. Unless there is a high necessity for passing a special and retroactive measure in order to give the people of this country the relief which they demand and to which they are entitled, then this bill ought not to be passed, for it is both retroactive and special. But there have been many instances in times past, taking the whole history of civilized people into view, when retroactive and special legislation was absolutely essential in order to prevent the most grievous injustice.

The legislative power of Congress over the subject matter is complete. Mark that. There is no restriction, there is no limitation, upon the legislative power of Congress over the subject The bill relates to the enforcement of the antitrust law. The antitrust law is founded upon the authority of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. Therefore, and so far as the subject matter is concerned, the authority or the power of Congress is complete and plenary. follows that Congress can perform any legislative act concerning this subject that is not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution.

Is there dissent from the proposition that I have just stated, that Congress has the authority to perform with respect to this subject any legislative act not prohibited by some other provision in the Constitution of the United States?

Assuming that to be a sound conclusion, let us again state what this bill proposes to do. It gives to certain persons and organizations the right to become parties to a suit in which a decree has been rendered and then to take the case made by the complainant, the complainant being the United States, acting all the while in the public interest and in a public capacity, to an appellate tribunal for the purpose of having the decree reviewed with all the formalities, with all the safeguards, with all the law that would have been applicable if the United States, the complainant, had taken an appeal.

Without now considering other provisions of the Constitution with which it has been said the bill is in conflict, it can not be alleged that the bill, if passed, would not be a legislative act. It is a legislative act, but, nevertheless, it may be repugnant to some part of the Constitution to which I have not referred; and to that inquiry I will presently pass.

The proof that it would be a legislative act, if passed, lies in this: No one will question that if we were to pass a general law, prospective in its operation, making just such provision as is contained in this bill, that it would be valid. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits either special legislation or retroactive legislation. Sometimes, without very much consideration, we assume that because legislation is retroactive, or because it is special, therefore it is invalid, but under our Constitution it is not so. There are many of the States in the Union whose constitutions forbid special legislation upon a subject of this character, but not so with the Constitution of the United States. If any such act is invalid, it must, therefore, be for some other reason.

The objection most relied on is that the time for appeal in the case has expired; that the plan approved is in course of execution, and that rights have been or may have been vested which might be, through the appeal, impaired or divested. I beg that Senators will hold that objection in mind while I consider its validity and its soundness

It will not be contended that as to the parties at least, this objection is well taken. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided positively, without any inditations, I think, that there is no vested right in an immunity from an appeal; in other words, the fact that the time has expired for an appeal, the fact that the law gave to neither of the parties a right. or the fact that the law gave to neither of the parties a right l to appeal, gives to the parties to the suit when a decree has been rendered no vested right in the immunity from an appeal. To put it in another way, in any such case as I have stated it is undoubtedly true that Congress can confer upon either party the right to take an appeal, even though the time has expired, or, to put it more strongly still, even though under the law as it was when the decree was rendered there was no right of a peal.

This was the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, in 174 United States Reports, beginning at page 445. In that case jurisdiction had been given to the United States court in Oklahoma or in the Indian Territory to hear those who claimed certain lands under the allotments made by what is ordinarily known as the Dawes Com-It allowed parties claiming those lands to bring suits in the United States court for that Territory in order that their allotments might be adjudicated and determined by the decree of the court. The statute which conferred this jurisdiction upon the circuit court in the Indian Territory made no provision for an appeal; there was no right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from any such decree; decree when once rendered was final, and the right of the parties in so far as affected by the decree became as vested as rights can be under a decree of a court.

Congress shortly afterwards passed a law giving to some of the parties in these cases the right of appeal, and that was given after the decree was rendered and after any such right might be said to have become vested. The constitutionality of the act was challenged upon the very ground taken by those who oppose the validity of the bill now under consideration, and this is what the Supreme Court of the United States said upon that subject:

upon that subject:

The contention is that the act of July 1, 1898, in extending the remedy by appeal to this court was invalid because retrospective, an invasion of the judicial domain, and destructive of vested rights. By its terms the act was to operate retrospectively, and as to that it may be observed that while the general rule is that statutes should be so construed as to give them only a prospective operation, yet where the language employed expresses a contrary intention in unequivocal terms, the mere fact that the legislation is retroactive does not necessarily render it void.

And while it is undoubtedly true that legislatures can not set aside the judgments of courts, compet them to grant new trials, order the discharge of offenders, or direct what steps shall be taken in the progress of a judicial inquiry, the grant of a new remedy by way of review has been often sustained under particular circumstances.

Here the Supreme Court cites a number of cases upon which

Here the Supreme Court cites a number of cases upon which it relies and then continues:

The United States Court in the Indian Territory is a legislative court and was authorized to exercise jurisdiction in these citizenship cases as a part of the machinery devised by Congress in the discharge of its duties in respect of these Indian tribes, and assuming that Congress possesses plenary power of legislation in regard to them—

And, of course, no more with regard to those courts than the circuit court of the United States, which is also a creature of Congress-

It follows that the validity of remedial legislation of this sort can not be questioned unless in violation of some prohibition of that instrument.

strument.

In its enactment Congress has not attempted to interfere in any way with the judicial department of the Government, nor can the act be properly regarded as destroying any vested right, since the right asserted to be vested is only the exemption of these judgments from review, and the mere expectation of a share in the public lands and moneys of these tribes, if hereafter distributed, if the applicants are admitted to citizenship, can not be held to amount to such an absolute right of property that the original cause of action, which is citizenship or not, is placed by the judgment of a lower court beyond the power of reexamination by a higher court though subsequently authorized by general law to exercise jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The case to which the Senator has called attention decides that no vested right is involved because the right which was claimed to be vested was a mere expectation to share in certain lands. What would the Senator say if the title to the lands had actually vested by the decree?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the right to the lands did vest by the decree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Supreme Court seems to consider that it did not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, if the Senator from Utah will examine the record, it will be found that so far as the right of a particular person to any particular tract of land or a particular share in the proceeds of lands was concerned, the decree was final and there was nothing further to be done, unless possibly to pass the naked legal title by some formal instru-

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas? Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I had the honor of drawing the act referred to in the case from which the Senator has quoted. In that case the question involved was that of the right to enrollment and to participate in tribal property, real estate, and money. The same question was raised in the committee, as I recollect, as to the validity of that enactment. The position taken by me at that time was that, it being tribal money and tribal property, Congress had the power, having control of the property, to enact this law to permit people to appeal in questions of citizenship, because the property rights had not yet passed.

Mr. CUMMINS. But whatever may be the form in which the property may have appeared, the decree of the court determined the right of those who appealed to a portion of that property or a portion of the money. There was a great deal nearer approach, as it seems to me, to a vested right in that case than in this. There has been no right vested in the case before the Senate. Whatever has been done by these corporations since the decree has been voluntarily done, with the assurance upon the part of the court that, if they did what was here outlined, the court believed that they would be in harmony with the law and that they would create competitive conditions.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right here?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The decision from which the Senator has read clearly declared that Congress had no power to grant a retrial or a new trial. Now, the Tobacco Co. case, which the Senator is discussing, having been absolutely decided at one time by the Supreme Court, is not the bringing in of entirely new parties, giving them a status in a case that has already been tried, and ordering the court to rehear the case with new parties in it, a new trial, and would it not come within the inhibition declared there by the Supreme Court?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so. It is very far from ordering a new trial. There is no new trial even suggested in the bill before the Senate. I grant that Congress can not legislatively order a court to grant a new trial. This bill provides that these persons and organizations may intervene in the court below. They then become parties to that record and parties to that decree. There is no further trial in the circuit court, and they are then given the right to appeal from that decree precisely as the United States might have appealed

There is no retrial; there is no reversal or possible reversal of any decision that has been made by the Supreme Court of the United States. This is simply a plan by which what the Attorney General ought to have done Congress will permit somebody else to do; namely, to take in an appellate way this record from the circuit court and give it to the Supreme Court for review according to the law of the land as it was when the decree was entered.

I am not asking that these defendants or anybody else be judged by any other or different law than the one in existence at the time the decree was entered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask a question right along that line. If this is not a retrial, a new trial in the Supreme Court, then what is to prevent Congress, instead of bringing in new parties, from passing a resolution directing the Attorney General to take an appeal to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe there are some Senators who perhaps before we have finished would add that to this bill. think it can be done. I did not pursue that course because I had a good deal of doubt originally with regard to the power of Congress in that respect, with regard to our right, speaking of "right" now in the sense of authority or power, to order the Attorney General to take an appeal in this specific case, but the second and the more persuasive reason in my mind was that I did not want the Attorney General to have anything to do with the appeal. He has publicly expressed satisfaction with this decree. He refused upon the application of all the independent dealers in tobacco throughout the United States and all these trade organizations to take an appeal. Now, however honest he may have been—and I am not challenging his integrity in that respect—he is the last person in the world who ought to be asked to take this case into the Supreme Court and there attempt to secure that justice which many others who have looked at the decree feel that the Supreme Court will grant if the appeal is properly presented there.

Mr. McCUMBER. My reason for the suggestion, I will say to the Senator, is that it might avoid a condition which seems to impress me more than it does the Senator, and that is that we are in effect granting a new trial. The Senator brings in parties whose interest has in no way been adjudicated.

They become parties because the Senator must assume that they have some interest. Therefore—

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a minute.
Mr. McCUMBER. Let me finish the sentence. Therefore it would be an interest to be adjudicated that was not adjudicated heretofore.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President— Mr. McCUMBER. And if that is not a trial of the case and practically the granting of a trial, I do not know what you mean by retrial.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly the Senator from North Dakota was not here Saturday all the while, and therefore he has fallen into an error with respect to the subject he has just mentioned. These intervenors come in without any interest of their own. They have no interest to allege or protect except the public interest, the very interest that the United States attempted to protect in bringing the suit. They assert no right of theirs. They simply assert the right of the people of the United States. Their interest is in having the antitrust law enforced according to its letter and its spirit. Therefore there is no retrial. They take that record exactly as it is, and the question before the Supreme Court will be, Is the decree which has been entered by the circuit court in New York a fulfillment of the law and a fulfillment of the opinion of the Supreme Court in adjudging these defendants guilt of a violation of the law?

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Iowa has stated what I was in part going to say. There is no retrial, rehearing, or reexamination of evidence or adjudication of any new interest in the court below. There is no trial or rehearing or examination or adjudication of any new interest in the court above. The interest of the parties who are to take the appeal will be precisely the same after the trial is over as it was before, whatever the decree of the Supreme Court may be and regardless of what the final judgment of the Supreme Court may be, so far as their individual interests are concerned. This bill might just as well have provided that the assistant district attorney for the district of New York might have taken the appeal, and his interest would not have been adjudicated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems that we are bringing in private individuals, who the Senator concedes have no interest in the controversy, and asking these private corporations to represent the people as appellants in a case-

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no private corporation recognized by this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, some of these tobacco companies. Mr. CUMMINS. They are not corporations at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. These individuals. Mr. CUMMINS. No. They are public-interest associations. The Senator knows what I mean. They are all associations without profit and without business. They are organized for the purpose of advancing a cause, or a business, or a trade. But they are not engaged in business. Then there are the attorneys general of four or five States, and the State of Wisconsin, as a State eo nomine. These are the persons we desire to entrust with the appeal in this case.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator to understand that my questions are not at all predicated upon an objection to his bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure of that, Mr. McCUMBER. Personally I should like to have a rehearing in the case, if it is possible, but I want to get the reason for bringing in the States or private associations of any character to represent the United States Government in the prosecution of a United States statute. I understand the Senator has given the reason, that practically he would hardly expect the energy on the part of the present Attorney General that he would like to have in the prosecution of these cases, because his energy might be affected a little by his belief as indicated in the settlement of the prior cases. But it does seem to me we ought to have some way to reach that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not the prior cases, Assuming that the Attorney General is honest, and I have never challenged the fact the he believes that this is just such a decree as should have been entered, while he did not formally in the sense of the law consent to the decree, yet the decree is largely his own handiwork and it would be both illogical and somewhat farcical to say, in view of that, that he shall appeal this case, and go to the Supreme Court and urge that the decree which he himself had largely prepared shall be reversed.

Therefore I took this course, and I took it because these organizations and States and the persons and the attorneys general appeared before the circuit court in New York and made known their objections to the decree proposed to be entered. They are chosen because they seem to be the fittest persons to present the appeal. They have no selfish interest whatever in it. They can not advantage themselves, a single one of them, by a penny in fortune. If they are successful in accomplishing this, they will take to the Supreme Court in the public interest a decree which, from my standpoint, the Attorney General himself should have taken.

I now pass on a step further from the case I have cited. remind the lawyers of the Senate-and I hardly need do itthat there is nothing in our Constitution with regard to vested That term is not used in the Constitution. There is no prohibition against the destruction or impairment of vested rights as such. The only provision in our Constitution that can be suggested or summoned to sustain the objection which is proposed by the majority of the committee is the fifth amendment to the Constitution, of which I will read a paragraph, at least, in order that Senators may have it in mind.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator from Iowa leaves that branch of the subject, I should like to inquire whether the attorneys general mentioned in this bill had connection with the suit as representing their States or otherwise before the court?

Mr. CUMMINS. They had not. I will restate what I said

Saturday about it.

Mr. WORKS. I am sorry I did not hear it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The case went to decree in the court below. It came to the Supreme Court, and went back to the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York with the United States as complainant and the American Tobacco Co. and its associated corporations as defendants. Then the Government, through the Attorney General, and the American Tobacco Co. and its followers went into conference with the court or with the judges of the court to ascertain, apparently, what sort of reorganization or disintegration ought to take place; and those conferences were secret. But somehow or other what was being done leaked out and became in a sense public property through the newspapers. Then these attorneys general and the State of Wisconsin and these trade organizations, looking after the interest of their various localities, appeared, protesting against the plan which the newspapers had suggested was about to be approved and asked to be made parties to the suit. They were refused the privilege of being made parties to the suit, and I think properly so, under the law as it then was. Then the court gave them the privilege-after the plan had really been agreed upon and after the conferences were all concluded—of coming in and making argument against the plan.

Mr. WORKS. Without any right on their part to take advantage of the situation if the ruling should be against them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Without any such right or opportunity. Mr. WORKS. Therefore the object and purpose of this bill is to give them that opportunity as stated?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the sole object.

Mr. WORKS. I want the Senator to know that I am not in any way opposed to his efforts. On the contrary, I am in sympathy with them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that, and I carnestly wish that all of the Senators who have not heard the details of this suit from its beginning to its end will make such inquiries as will put them in possession of all the facts, because they are very interesting, they are very curious, and they are without precedent.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Nebraska proceeds, I want to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that those on this side of the Chamber can not hear when Senators hold private colloquies among themselves, as the Senator from Nebraska is about to do, turning in the direction of the Senator who is speaking with his back to this side of the Chamber. It is impossible for us to keep up with the discussion, in which we are very much interested; and I ask, without again interrupting, that Senators should speak, not with reference to the necessity of being heard by those in their immediate neighborhood, but by those in other parts of the Chamber who can not now hear

Mr. BROWN. I wanted to suggest in connection with the statement of the Senator that it was his desire that Senators should know the facts, if they did not already know them, that if it was agreeable to him he put into the RECORD the statement of the facts in the case he cited, because a statement of the facts in that case entirely will answer the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. As a matter of fact, the only real question involved in that case was a question of ownership of property, and if vested rights could be established at all by the judgment in that case, they were vested by reason of the judgment in

While it is true that the act which submitted to the jurisdiction of that court the question recited and provided that the inquiry should be with regard to the citizenship of certain Indians, on the citizenship rested the right to property, and when the court decided the citizenship it decided the right to property. That is shown exactly by the statement of facts in I should like to see it go into the RECORD with the that case. opinion the Senator has read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In view of what the Senator from Nebraska says about the case of Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, my recollection of the situation is that what the court had already done was to lay down a rule or what was in effect a rule according to which property rights thereafter, if the rule had been put in force, would have been adjusted, but the property rights had never been adjusted. The right to the property never had been vested. That is the distinction I was undertaking to make. .

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia. Mr. BACON. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question in connection with the contention he is making with respect to vested rights. I should like the Scnator to state what particular right has vested in the tobacco case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not entirely familiar with all the facts of the tobacco ease, but my understanding is that these various corporations authorized by the decree have been organized; specific property has passed into the hands of these new corporations; the stock has changed hands repeatedly; the stock has now gone into the hands of various individuals who at the time of the decree were not interested. Indeed, there has been a complete shifting of the ownership of a good deal of the specific property.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean that as a vested right in fee simple?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My contention is that when a judgment has been rendered by a court fixing certain rights, and when under that decree or judgment the title to specific property has passed into the hands of private citizens, it is no longer in the power of the court or in the power of the legislature to disturb those vested rights.

Mr. BACON. Let me analyze that for a moment. Take the particular case where a decree of a court is rendered and under that decree a certain corporation has been formed. That corporation has issued certain bonds, and those bonds have been bought by A, B, and C. Is it the contention of the Senator that A, B, and C have a vested right in the bonds?

Before the Senator answers the question I will call his attention to where I think the defect in his argument is. A, B, and C have not simply a vested right in the bonds. They have the title to the bonds, so that they do not claim under any vested right; they claim the bonds by right of absolute ownership. So, when a party claims that he has a vested right there must be something less than absolute ownership. Does the Senator mean that they have a vested right in the decree of the court? Does the Senator mean that each corporation has a vested right in the right to be an immaculate corporation, operating free from any attack or criticism, or what is the vested right? That is what I want the Senator to put his finger on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I mean precisely what I said, and I can not make it any clearer than I have already made it. I mean that when the judgment of a court fixes the right of a party in a specific piece of property, that right then becomes

Mr. BACON. Very well. There is no one who can possibly dispute the right of a purchaser of these bonds to the title to the bonds, and there is nothing here to contravene that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not speaking about bonds; I am speaking about the property itself.

Mr. BACON. Well, the stock of the corporation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I have already said, it is the specific personal property taken out of a warehouse and under the decree vested in another and a distinct corporation, and the right to that in turn transferred by means of the transfer of stock to numerous individuals. That is what I mean.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing to yield, having raised the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to ask the Senator from Utah right there, when the courts say to a corporation, If you will reorganize yourself in a certain way we believe that you will be in harmony with the law, and the corporation goes on and reorganizes itself in that certain way, does the Senator think that there is any vested right on the part of anybody who deals with that corporation or any vested right of the corporation in any property that it may take under that judicial sanction?

The Senator from Utah forgets that this decree does not award to any company any property. It does not declare that any of these men, Mr. Duke for instance, shall be the owner of certain property or that this corporation shall be the owner of certain property. It simply says, You have submitted a plan to us. Now, we believe that if you work it out you will be in harmony with the law, and we will undertake not to disturb you if you do the thing which we have pointed out here.

Now, that is the character of this decree. It is as far removed from anything in the nature of vested rights as one could possibly imagine.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the decree goes further than the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Iowa seem to state. It does not amount simply to a declaration on the part of the court that the court believes a certain thing should be done

Mr. CUMMINS. That was merely a paraphrase, of course. Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Supreme Court of the United States held that the existing tobacco organization was in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and sent the case back to the circuit court with directions to the court to investigate it and devise a scheme which would bring that organization into harmony with the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. It did not direct the court to do so. directed the court to approve a plan that would accomplish certain results.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, it amounts to the same thing; it directed the court finally to pass upon the question as to whether or not the scheme proposed was in harmony with the antitrust law. Now, such a scheme was presented. It underwent modifications from time to time, but as presented and finally adopted, the circuit court held that the scheme was under the direction and decision of the court in accordance with the law

Mr. CUMMINS. It did. Mr. SUTHERLAND. That, as I understand it, made that question res adjudicata, and the question could not be litigated again unless some new facts were developed. I do not mean to say, because the court had declared in favor of a certain scheme, and thereafter the scheme itself would operate in such a way as to violate the Sherman antitrust law, a new case could not be instituted.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a vast difference between res adjudicata, between holding that the situation was one in harmony with the law, and vesting any right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I mean to say is that when a case is res adjudicata, and it has become a final judgment under the law, that situation can no more be reviewed. That is the position I suggest here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Brown in the chair).

Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there could not be any question of res adjudicata here, I presume, if the Attorney General had taken his appeal within 60 days, because it would not become res adjudicata until the judgment would be final. It is clear that there is no constitutional provision prohibiting us from enacting a law retroactive in effect, and extending the time in which an appeal should be taken, and it would not be res adjudicata at any time until the judgment issued had become final and passed beyond the point where it could be affected by Mr. SUTHERLAND. The judgment is final now, is it not?

Mr. BORAH. I think it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And it is res adjudicata.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but here is a different proposition. There is nothing, it seems to me, which has become vested in the sense that they have a right which can not be disturbed, because what is it that they have by virtue of that decree which they are entitled to as against an appeal? Have they a right to pursue this particular course, and a vested right as against the judgment of the Supreme Court to modify it. It is not a vested disturb it.

right in any sense. The whole proposition, so far as vested rights are concerned, is that there is no vested right in the matter

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I may supplement what the Senator from Idaho has just stated by reminding the Senate that this property is still in existence. No one proposes to take a penny from it. Those who represent it, either in the way of bonds or stocks, or whatever other evidences of ownership they have, still hold the property. There is nothing in this appeal that can possibly take from anyone who has become interested in the property a single penny of his investment. The only thing in question is the relation of the various parts of the property to each other; whether that can be adjudicated as it was attempted to be done by the circuit court, establishing a status innocence, whether that can be said to be a vested right. I can not understand the claim of a vested interest or vested right in a matter of this sort, because, as I was about to say when interrupted a few moments ago, our prohibition in the Constitution is against taking property without due process of law. That is the only prohibition which limits the power of Congress so far as this bill is concerned. In that respect the Constitution says:

No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Now, unless this legislation takes property without due process of law it is not subject to the objection which has been urged against it. I repeat that there is no property taken here and the processes of the law are all provided for. Suppose an appeal is taken in this case and the Supreme Court reverses the decree and holds that the reorganization was not in harmony with the law and did not create competitive conditions, whose property is taken without due process of law?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
Mr. CUMMINS. And it is due process of law if the Supreme Court finally adjudges some other organization or some other plan of distribution. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The only thing the Supreme Court of the United States would do would be to hold that the decree as approved was not in harmony with its instructions or was not in honest compliance with the Sherman law.

The only possible thing that could be claimed as a vested right would be that the parties below were entitled to have that particular form of decree or that particular plan approved as against any other plan. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment I want to read—
Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I yield for that purpose

Mr. BORAH. In the case of Freeland v. Williams—this was a matter which involved a constitutional provision of the State a matter which involved a constitutional provision of the state of West Virginia—one individual had obtained a judgment against another individual which grew out of the taking of some cattle during the late Civil War. That judgment became final and established the right of the parties. Thereafter, the constitution of the State of West Virginia provided that no judgment of this kind should be binding; in other words, that if the judgment would have been one which, notwithstanding the constitution, would have been valid, the constitution of West Virginia undertook to say a judgment thus obtained should not be realized upon, for the reason that it was supposed to have been acquired in contravention to the rules of war. But this is the point to which I wish to call attention, and it is covered by a single paragraph:

covered by a single paragraph;

Prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment the power to provide such remedies, although they may have interfered with what were called vested rights, seems to have been fully conceded. The cases in which this had been decided in this court are Calder v. Bull. 3 Dail., 386; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet., 380; Sampeyreac v. United States, 7 Pet., 222; Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet., 88; and Freeborn v. Smith, 2 Wall., 160. In the latter case Mr. Justice Grier, when the Congress of the United States had allowed an appeal where the judgment would have otherwise been final, used this language: "If the judgment below was erroneous, the plaintiff in error had a moral right, at least, to laye it set aside, and the defendant is only claiming a vested right in a wrong judgment." And he thus quotes the language of Chief Justice Parker, in Foster v. Essex Bank, 16 Mass., 245: "The truth is there is no such thing as a vested right to do wrong; and a legislature, which, in its acts not expressly authorized by the constitution, limits itself to correcting mistakes and to providing remedies for the furtherance of justice, can not be charged with violating its duty or exceeding its authority."

As the Senator from Iowa says, no property rights are taken away; they have simply decided upon a plan. The question, and the sole question, is whether that plan is in harmony with the judgment of the Supreme Court and in honest compliance with the laws of the United States. The only possible thing that could be disturbed would be this particular plan. If it is wrong they could have no possible vested right to pursue it; if it is right the Supreme Court of the United States would not

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I pass now to the second objection made to the bill by the majority of the committee. It is that the bill attempts to confer original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court. Of course every lawyer concedes at once that it is not within the power of Congress to confer original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court; that is to say, that the instances mentioned in the Constitution for such original jurisdiction can not be enlarged by Congress. Therefore the only point to which we ought to give our attention is whether this bill does confer or attempt to confer original jurisdiction upon What will be the process if this bill is enacted? These people will appear in the circuit court, and thereupon they will give the notice that is required for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and thereupon the record made in the circuit court of the United States will be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States; and upon that record—that is, upon the decree which has been rendered by the circuit court—the Supreme Court will pass its judgment.

It is a contradiction in terms to say that such jurisdiction is original jurisdiction upon the part of the Supreme Court. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is exercised when the court below has rendered a final judgment and an appeal is taken from that judgment and the Supreme Court appear is taken from that judgment and the Supreme Court reviews the judgment entered by the inferior tribunal. This is very well illustrated in the very latest case in which the Supreme Court has referred to this doctrine. It is the case of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (215 U. S.). I shall not read very much of it. It is referred to in the report of the majority of the committee, but there is a little of it that indicates very clearly what original jurisdiction is, and I have but to read it in order to show its application to the present instance. its application to the present instance.

"In the early days of the Government the right of Congress to give original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in cases not enumerated in the Constitution was maintained by many jurists, and seems to have been entertained by the learned judges who decided Todd's case."

The court had already referred to that case.

The court had alrendy referred to that case.

"But discussion and more mature examination has settled the question otherwise; and it has long been the established doctrine, and we believe now assented to by all who have examined the subject, that the original jurisdiction of this court is confined to the cases specified in the Constitution and that Congress can not enlarge it. In all other cases its power must be appellate."

Such is the settled rule, and it is inadmissible to suppose that it was the intention of Congress to run counter to it.

Ordinarily in the Federal courts, in the absonce of express statutory authority, no appeal can be taken or writ of error brought except from a final decree or to a final judgment. (McLish v. Roff, 141 U. S. 661, 665; Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. 201, 205.) There is no final judgment or decree in this case, nor any judicial determination from which an appeal would lie. The Alicia (7 Wall., 571) is in point.

In that case it appeared that on the 9th day of January, 1863, a decree of condemnation had been entered in the district court against the Alicia and her cargo for violation of the blockade. From this decree an appeal was allowed and taken to the circuit court, and on the 18th of May, 1867, an order was made in that court on the application of the parties in interest—there being at this time in the circuit court no order, judgment, or decree in the case—for the transfer of the cause to this court under the thirteenth section of the act of June 30, 1864, which enacted that prize causes depending in the circuit court might be so transferred. This court held that the cause was removed to the circuit court by the appeal from the decree of the district court and that that decree was vacated by the appeal, and that the circuit court acquired full jurisdiction of the cause and was fully authorized to proceed to final hearing and decree. And Chief Justice Chase said (p. 573): "Nor can it be doubted that under the Constitution this court can exercise in prize causes appellate juri

I read that in order to show the very obvious distinction between the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the original jurisdiction of the court. If this decree, final in its character-of course final, or there could be no appeal taken from it to the Supreme Court-is appealed from, and finds its ways to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there the court passes upon the decree and determines whether it is in harmony with the law and in harmony with its prior opinion. who will assert that the Supreme Court is exercising original rather than appellate jurisdiction? It seems to me that the objection is without merit.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. Mr. BORAH. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I want to is the case of Freeborn v. Smith, reported in 69 United States, second Wallace, page 160. This was a case which arose out of the state of facts at the time of the admission of Nevada into the Union. The admission act failed to provide for the cases which were on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

A man by the name of Freeborn had obtained a judgment in the district court below against a man by the name of Smith. Of course, when the Territory was admitted as a State into the Union, the admission act not providing for the keeping alive of cases which were then upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the appeal died, and the judgment below became final, quite as much so as the judgment could possibly be in any case here, because, without such a provision, it could not have been heard in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, upon motion to dismiss, intimated that the appeal had died and that it could not hear the case, but, in view of the fact that legislation was pending by which the right of appeal could be perfected, the Supreme Court retained it and afterwards heard it. The provision for this appeal passed Congress many months after judgment had become final. When it went to the Supreme Court, attorneys for the parties who were complaining against the right of appeal, said:

As to the jurisdiction, our position is that the act is a retro-spective enactment interfering with vested rights.

For the reason that the judgment had become final, the right of the parties was fixed, and their status was final.

Certainly it attempts to confer on this court jurisdiction to review judgments which, by law, at the time of its passage were final and absolute. The necessary result of maintaining it would be to disturb and impair these judgments, unsettie what had been previously settled, and compel the parties to litigate anew matters already definitely adjudicated. There is no higher evidence that rights have vested than a final judgment solemnly confirming them. Law is defined to be a rule of conduct; and to call an enactment which undertakes to deal with past transactions, and subject them to new requirements and conditions as tests of their legality, a rule of conduct, is to confound all rational ideas on the subject.

But the Supreme Court held the act of Congress valid and heard the appeal. I will only read a paragraph or two from the Supreme Court decision.

It is objected to the act of 27th February, just passed, that it is ineffectual for the purpose intended by it; that it is a retrospective act interfering directly with vested rights, that the result of maintaining it would be to disturb and impair judgments which, at the time of its passage, were final and absolute; that the powers of Congress are strictly legislative, and this is an exercise of judicial power which Congress is not competent to exercise. But we are of opinion that these objections are not well founded.

It is well settled that where there is no direct constitutional prohibition, a State may pass retrospective laws, such as, in their operation, may affect suits pending, and give to a party a remedy which he did not previously possess, or modify an existing remedy, or remove an impediment in the way of legal proceedings.

If the judgment below was erroneous, the plaintiff in error had a moral right at least to have it set aside, and the defendant is only claiming a vested right in a wrong judgment.

Mr. President, as I said a few moments ago, there could not be any vested right here unless they claim that it arose out of the fact of the peculiar form which this judgment took and their right to continue to pursue a business under the line marked out by that judgment. So far as conferring original jurisdiction upon the court is concerned, as the Senator from Iowa has just said, it simply removes to the Supreme Court a case which has been tried below, and which the Supreme Court will hear solely upon an appeal, and not as an exercise of original jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I have not the Senator's bill before me, but, as I recall, it does not propose to vest in the parties named the right to appeal in the name of the United States, but in their Am I correct in that? own names.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Georgia is correct. Mr. BACON. Upon that understanding, I want to say to the Senator that, while I am in perfect sympathy with the purpose he has in view, I very gravely doubt the efficacy of the bill if it should be passed in that shape; and it is upon the ground of the constitutional question as to original jurisdiction that my doubt is rested.

The point, as I understand it, is that these parties were not parties to the suit in the case in the court below; that the parties in the court below were the Government on one side and these defendants on the other; that this appeal, if taken, is not to be taken by the party who was the plaintiff in the court call attention to another case, and, while not conclusive upon this particular point, it certainly throws much light upon it. It to be substituted for them. The doubt in my mind is as to whether the substitution of parties who were not parties to the record in the court below and the bringing up of that case in their name alone would not constitute an original case in the Supreme Court, which would be subject to the constitutional prohibition. That is my trouble.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope that upon reflection, the Senator from Georgia will see the case from my point of view. These organizations and States and the Attorney General are admitted as parties to a case already pending in one sense, and they become parties complainant in every proper sense. They assert only the rights which have been asserted by the United States; they have no case of their own as distinguished from the case for the general or public interest. The circuit court in New York has decided the case; it has entered a decree in the case, and the appeal that would be taken by the proposed intervenors would present to the Supreme Court of the United States, not any case for the intervenors in their own special interest, but it would present the exact case that had been tried by the circuit court; it would present the decree that has been entered by the circuit court; it would challenge the correctness of that decree; and the jurisdiction exercised by the Supreme Court would be to hear and determine whether that decree was in harmony and in fulfillment of its former opinion.

Now, in the very nature of things, that must be appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court could not exercise original jurisdiction in such a case. The work that it is called upon to do is appellate. It is called upon to review a decision, not to enter upon an investigation of the case originally and enter finally a judgment of its own. So, I hope that, in view of these considerations, the Senator from Georgia will find that this would present a case of appellate jurisdiction, and not of original jurisdiction.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.
Mr. POMERENE. Assuming, without admitting, that there is some foundation for the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], might it not be avoided by amending the bill as presented by the Senator from Iowa by inserting something like this: "Said appeal may be taken on behalf of the said intervenors or by them or any of them on behalf of the United States of America?"

Mr. CUMMINS. It might, although I think that the bill as it is will accomplish the purpose. I may say here that the bill was amended in the committee in one or two respects, in one very important respect at the suggestion and upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia; but unfortunately a majority of the committee in reporting the bill gave no heed whatever to the amendments which had been adopted by the committee, and the bill is here apparently without amendment, whereas, in fact, it should be here with the amendments which were consented to or agreed to by the committee. Before I have finished I shall call the attention of the Senate to the amendments and ask that they be adopted in order to perfect the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I made inquiry a while ago as to the rights of parties to whom this right of appeal is proposed to be granted, having in view the question as to whether, if they once got into the Supreme Court, they will have sufficient foundation to prosecute their appeal. It seems to me that is a very important matter to consider. You might by an act of Congress give the right of appeal to almost anyone, but if it reaches the Supreme Court certainly it would have to be presented by some one who has such an interest as would entitle him, if the time for the appeal had not elapsed, to present the question to the Supreme Court for adjudication. I have not examined this question with any degree of care, and therefore I am asking more for information than for anything else.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have examined it with very great care—Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And with a great desire to secure some relief. If the Senator from California or any other Senator can suggest any better or surer way of getting into the Supreme Court of the United States and obtaining a review of this decree, I shall be delighted to accept it. I have done the best I could, and I believe the bill will withstand all the objections and asand I believe the bill will withstand all the objections and as saults that may be made upon it. I do not pretend that it is wholly free from doubt, but I do say that a Senator ought not to permit some lingering doubt in his mind with regard to the effectiveness of the bill to stand in the way of putting the effectiveness of the bill to stand in the way of putting the gnestion up to the Supreme Court of the United States. We will never get any relief unless we pass some law providing for a review by the Supreme Court. If we make a mistake, we are no worse off than we were before; but if we allow a doubt to deter us from passing a bill of this sort, then the wrong can never be corrected, and the evil will never be remedied. is the reason I covet any suggestions that can be made by any Senator which have for their end the perfecting of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. Mr. POMERENE. Personally I have no doubt about the right of Congress to extend the time within which this appeal may be The Senator from Iowa has suggested a possible doubt of the right of Congress to confer upon the interveners the authority to appeal-

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator say that I have any doubt about that?

Mr. POMERENE. I understood the Senator to say that he was not entirely free from doubt.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is in error. I never had a doubt about that.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very glad to be corrected.
Mr. CUMMINS. The doubt I have expressed, which originally was in my mind and which has largely been removed by discussion, was whether we could command the Attorney General to take this appeal, but I have no doubt with regard to the validity of the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Iowa in my desire to have an appeal taken from this decree. I have not any doubt, from the investigation I have made, that Congress has the right to direct and instruct the Attorney General to take this appeal, and at the proper time I propose to offer as an amendment to this bill a new section instructing, authorizing, and directing the Attorney General to perfect an appeal in this case. When that is done—

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I will be very glad to accept that amendment to the bill. I only suggest that he make it independent, so that the whole bill will not fall if either path proves to be barred by constitutional obstacles.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it was my intention to offer the amendment I have suggested as a separate section, so that the Attorney General would be directed to make the appeal. Then, if any question should arise as to the authority of the intervenors to appeal, the case would still be in the Supreme Court. I believe, then, that the Supreme Court, adhering to its former practice, would permit the interveners, as friends of the court, to be heard, at least in the form of briefs.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Ohio has concluded to offer such an amendment. I may say to him that in the Committee on the Judiciary there were certain members, as will appear from the minority views, who believed that that is the course which should be taken. If the Senator from Ohio will refer to the minority views, he will see that the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] and the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Brown] proposed precisely the remedy that is suggested by the Senator from Ohio. I trust that the Senator from Ohio will offer the amendment; and I hope that, when it is offered, it will be adopted, because we will then have two strings to our bow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it seems to me that officials ought to desire to perform their duty, but sometimes they become a law unto themselves. In that event it is necessary to give special instructions.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California.
Mr. WORKS. I am not going to allow any doubt of mine as to the efficacy of this bill to prevent me from voting for it if it seems to be right in principle, as the Senator seems to apprehend, but I do desire to put it in just as effective shape as possible, because I believe in the bill.

I have no doubt at all that Congress may extend the time of appeal to one who is justly entitled to that right and has lost it as in the case cited by the Senator from Idaho. I have no doubt either that Congress has the right to grant the right of appeal to some one who is justly entitled to it; that is to say, one who is so interested in the result of the judgment as to warrant an interference on his part. But what I was trying to bring out is the question whether these parties had such interest in the proceedings as to justly entitle them to appeal and con-agreed to in the committee and one other, which is the logical sequence of the amendments offered in the committee, be now reported and agreed to, so that the bill may be before the Senate in the form in which the committee really intended it to be. I will be compelled to point out, I suppose, and offer these amendments on my own behalf inasmuch as they do not appear in the report of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am interested in the statement made by the Senator to the effect that these amendments were agreed to in committee but not reported. Can the Senator explain why that was done?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator know whether any action was taken reconsidering the votes?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was not. I assume it was a mere matter of oversight. This bill was disposed of in the committee, and, for reasons which I do not care to enter upon now and for which I was in no wise responsible and which I tried very hard to remove, six weeks elapsed between the time the committee ordered the bill reported and the time when it was reported. It is not unlikely that during that time the members who were authorized to report it from the committee overlooked the fact and forgot that these amendments were ordered in committee. They are not amendments which touch the merits of the measure or change its legal effect.

In accordance with what I have just said and in accordance with the action of the committee, I move to strike out the preamble of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Brown in the chair). Does the Senator state that the bill has been taken up for consideration by the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill has been taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate and under consideration?

Mr. CUMMINS. And I hope it will be voted on immediately. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, relying upon the statement of the Senator from Iowa that the bill is now before the Senate and under consideration-

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not a question of relying upon my statement. The Presiding Officer may refer to the RECORD to ascertain whether the bill was taken up for consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to understand the parliamentary situation in relation to the bill. It may be the understanding of the Senate that it proceeded to the consideration of the bill, but I did not so understand it. I understood that the bill had simply been laid before the Senate by the Chair in order that the Senator from Iowa might address the Senate upon it. As I understand, the bill is on the calendar under Rule VIII, and can be taken up only by unanimous consent or when the calendar is reached under Rule VIII.

Mr. CUMMINS. One need only refer to the notice that I gave originally to discover what my purpose was, and to refer to the RECORD to show what was done. I have assumed that the bill was before the Senate for consideration. I had no desire to make a speech upon it until we were ready to vote upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the very question that I desire to be informed upon, to wit, what the Record shows was the proceeding when the bill was laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated at the time the Senator made his request that the Senator from Iowa asked unanimous consent that the Senate consider the following bill; the Secretary then stated the title of the bill, and the Chair stated that without objection that was the business before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By the language "that the Senate consider the matter" does it stand in the same position before the Senate as though the Senate had voted to proceed to its consideration and disposition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would think so. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand it. I was absent when the Senator first called up the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assure the Senator from Connecticut that I have no purpose or desire to press the bill to a vote at a time when any Senator wants to have it further considered by way of debate or argument, but I assume that I might at least have the amendments which were considered in the committee, and which are not now found in the report of the committee, disposed of at this time, and the bill will then be ready for such further argument as Senators may desire to make upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not mean to intimate at all that the Senator from Iowa was trying to take any advantage or trying to do anything that was not strictly parliamentary, but I wanted to know whether the Senate had agreed to vote on the bill itself. I see no objection in agreeing to the amendments made in the committee if the Senate desires to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that unless some one desires to speak upon the bill, I shall ask for a vote immediately upon such amendments as may be offered to it. I have already moved to strike out the preamble. It was suggested by some one that that motion ought to come last. That was the recommendation of the committee-that the preamble should be stricken out.

VICE PRESIDENT. A proposition to strike out the . preamble to a bill is always disposed of after the amendments are voted upon and the bill is disposed of.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I will withdraw it until later. I move, after the word "suit," in line 8, on page 3, to insert: Of the United States v. American Tobacco Co, and others in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New

I may say that that is simply to make definite what was formerly a reference to the preamble, which it is expected will be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I further move to amend by striking out the word "said," in the fourth line on the fourth page.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I further move to amend by inserting the word "said" immediately before the word "circuit," in line 5, on page 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I further move to amend by inserting, after the word "States," in line 7, on page 4, the words "entered on the 16th day of November, 1911."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I further move to amend by adding, after the word "parties," at the end of line 9, page 4, the word "complainant."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I further move to amend, after the word "suit," in line 10, page 4, by inserting the words "enforcing the same rights enforced by the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I also move to amend by inserting, after the word "have," in line 10, page 4, the words "in the public interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have finished my observations upon the bill. I would be very glad to have a vote upon it or upon any amendments which may be offered to it. I think we might just as well dispose of it now, unless some Senator desires to discuss it further.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk. I should say that I desire to offer it as a separate section, to be known as section 3.

The Secretary. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Sec. 3. The Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized, directed, and instructed to appeal, on behalf of the United States of America, from the said decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the time within which said appeal may be taken and perfected is hereby extended for 60 days after the taking effect of the act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that a substitute for the bill, may I inquire?

Mr. POMERENE. It is not a substitute, but is an additional section, so that if the amendment is adopted it would authorize not only an appeal on behalf of the intervenors, but would direct the Attorney General to take an appeal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] has just been called from the Chamber on important business.

Mr. JONES. I will state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber, and also that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Brader] is out of the city. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to go on with the bill at this time, because the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] wishes to address the Senate upon it and he is not ready to do so to-day. But before asking that it be laid aside I should like to add one or two amendments and have the bill reprinted, so that the Senate may see it in its perfected state. I wish to amend the bill in order to dispose of certain doubts which exist in the present wording

On page 8, I move to strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, and to insert what I send to the desk, and I also wish to make a similar change on page 62, to make the bill correspond in all parts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 8 strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, and insert:

Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, whether subjects of China or subjects or citizens of any other country foreign to the United States; persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization unless otherwise excluded by existing agreements as to passports or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The two provisions next foregoing, however, shall not apply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to Mr. JONES. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask that the amendment be agreed to to-day?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I do not think the Senator can have any objection to it. It is to remove all possible doubt as to the question of the effect of the bill upon the Chinese-exclusion act. It is rather important that those acts shall remain in full force.

Mr. JONES. That is what I want to be sure of, Mr. LODGE. That is the whole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. As I understand the amendment, if it is agreed to now, we can not offer any further amendment if we desire.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly. I have no objection to including any amendment at all. I only want to have the bill reprinted so that the Senate can see exactly how the bill is proposed by the committee.

Mr. JONES. That is what I want to see, but I understand there is a rule that if a committee amendment is adopted it will not be subject to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. JONES. But not as in Committee of the Whole. Mr. LODGE. I should ask unanimous consent that it might be open to amendment if agreed to now.

Mr. JONES. That is all right.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On page 62, line 14, after the word "aliens," I move to insert:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On line 19 of the same page, after the words "United States," I move to insert "any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent or."

Mr. LODGE. On page 44, line 12, before the word "foreign," I move to strike out the word "from" and to insert the word

Mr. LODGE. I was merely looking to see if there were any other verbal amendments, but I think those are all, Mr. Presi-

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand it is the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to ask that the unfinished business, be temporarily laid aside. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill when he expects to take up the measure and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. LODGE. We expect to take it up to-morrow, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has indicated his desire to go on and speak upon the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. After it is taken up to-morrow will the Senator keep it before the Senate until we reach a vote?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to dispose of it as soon as possible.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator in behalf of the minority members of the Committee on Finance that we are very anxious to have House bill 18642, known as the bill to provide a metal schedule, taken up for consideration at the earliest practical day.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to put the slightest obstacle in the way of taking up that bill, but I think the Senator will find that the quickest method is to get this bill out of the way, which is now the unfinished business; and I do not see why this bill should delay us long.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true; and that is exactly what I am seeking to do. This bill has been the unfinished business now since the 9th day of April, and day after day it has been temporarily laid aside. If the Senator proposes to call it up tomorrow I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. LODGE. I had the bill postponed for several weeks at the request of the Senator from North Carolina, and I post-poned it the last few days at the request of the Senator from Vermont, who also desires to address the Senate upon it. I can assure the Senator that personally I have no desire to delay it one moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that he did postpone it in order that I might have an opportunity to make a speech, but it has now been more than two weeks, I think, since I made that speech and the measure is still pending: I am not complaining of the Senator; I simply wanted to ascertain whether it was his purpose after to-day to call up this measure and insist upon action on it.

Mr. LODGE. I called up the bill just as soon as I could make it the unfinished business, and the delays which have occurred have been owing to my desire to oblige other Senators who wish to speak upon it. Now, the Senator from Vermont will be ready to go on to-morrow, I understand, and I shall be prepared then to go forward with the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say further to the Senator I have no desire to interfere, provided it is his purpose to take up the the interest of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18642—not now, but within the next few days.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I was out of the city last week, and I suppose the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts was owing to that fact. I want to say something upon the bill, in the opening particularly about the general features of the question of emigration to this country. I would be very glad to go on to-morrow if it were not the fact that the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary which has charge of the question of the confirmation of Judge Sloan is holding a hearing to-day. We have been in session all day, and we are to hold a meeting this evening beginning at half past 7. We will probably be busy until midnight. That is the way many of us in the Senate are situated. That being the case, I will not be ready to go on to-morrow. This bill was delayed, as the Senator well knows, for three weeks in order that he might make a speech upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That speech was made two weeks ago. Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will be ready to go on upon Wednesday or Thursday, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill has not been held up on my account for the last two weeks.

Mr. LODGE. It is perfectly satisfactory to me to go on with the bill on Wednesday, and I will say that without unreasonable delay we ought to take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if there is not some other Senator who would desire to address the Senate on the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I know of no one else who desires to speak on the bill on this side, as far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator, for my information and that of the Senate, if he thinks there would be any difficulty in securing final action during the day Wednesday or Thursday?

Mr. LODGE. As far as I am aware there is nothing to prevent our disposing of the bill after the Senator from Vermont has There are amendments which will have to be disposed spoken. of, but I am not aware of anything that will lead to any protracted debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know of no disposition on this side to further discuss the measure. I think all that is necessary is to get the matter before the Senate, and we can dispose of it very quickly.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Then on Wednesday at the close of the routine morning business I will ask the Senate to take up the bill that the Senator from Vermont may speak upon it, and I shall ask the Senate to dispose of it as soon as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts now asks that the bill be reprinted in the form in which it is now before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; with the amendments which have been adopted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the amendments which have been agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. And then that it be temporarily laid aside. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the order for a reprint of the bill? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the bill is temporarily laid aside.

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the bill (S. 3607) to give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to certain organizations or persons in the suit of the United States against American Tobacco Co. and others be taken up for consider-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks, according to a notice heretofore filed, the Chair should recognize the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene], who gave notice that he would desire to speak immediately following the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, as the Senator from Georgia wants to speak and has to go away to-night, if it might not be well to let the bill be printed as amended, with the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, and take it up on a certain day. Any day will suit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from North Carolina suggest a day and ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on that day?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will agree to any day, and I think this day a week

Mr. CUMMINS. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.
Mr. OVERMAN. To-day a week would suit the Senator?
Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose we could get a vote upon the bill within the next 10 minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. By unanimous consent we can agree to take it up at any time, and that will not displace anything else.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that the first suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina be acted upon, and that is that the bill be printed in the shape it is now, with the amendments agreed to and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, and then we can readily determine as to a date, to see it myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does anyone make that request? Mr. OVERMAN. I make the request simply that the bill be taken up on Monday next after the routine morning business and that it be voted on during that calendar day. Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator to fix an hour. Mr. OVERMAN. No; not an hour, but that we will vote upon it on that calendar day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I would probably accede to it to-morrow, but I want to see the bill in print before I agree to it. I can not tell what the bill is now.

Mr. CUMMINS. This fixes next Monday, which is a whole week in advance. I am sure that the Senator from Georgia would be able to acquaint himself with the amendments that we have made during that time.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I will not interpose any objection.
Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the bill be reprinted with the pending amendment in italics and all the amendments agreed to in small capitals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE STANDARD OIL AND THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate, for the purposes of discussion only, Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, which the Secretary will state.

The Secretary. Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene] June 1, 1911, a concurrent resolution instructing the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this resolution recites, in substance, that the Supreme Court of the United States has decreed that the Standard Oil Co. and its codefendants and the American Tobacco Co. and its codefendants, whether corporate or individual, have formed and maintained a combination in restraint of trade; that they have conspired to monopolize and have monopolized a substantial part of the commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations; that they have formed these combinations and monopolies in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust law; that no criminal prosecutions have been begun against them or against any of them; and then declares it to be the sense of the Senate and House of Representatives that criminal prosecutions should be begun against all of the said parties and persons where, in the opinion of the Attorney General, the criminal provisions of the statute have been violated, and instructs him to institute such criminal proceedings where the evidence, in his opinion, will justify the same.

Without intending to go into detail, the Standard Oil Co. and its promoters up to the year 1890 had formed and maintained a combination in restraint of trade and in violation of the common law of the land, and since the enactment of the Sherman law, in 1890, both the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. have persistently and continuously violated not only the common law of the land, but also the criminal provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust law.

A careful examination of the opinions of the Supreme Court in these cases will be sufficient to convince any fair-minded man that the Supreme Court was of the opinion that these two companies knowingly, deliberately, and defiantly violated the provisions of this law.

In the Standard Oil Co. case the Supreme Court said:

The court below held that the acts and dealings established by the proof operated and destroyed the "potentiality of competition," which otherwise would have existed to such an extent as to cause the transfers of stock which were made to the New Jersey corporation, and the control of which resulted over the many and various subsidiary corporations to be a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of the first section of the act, but also to be an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization bringing about a perennial violation of the second section.

And then the Supreme Court adds:

We see no cause to doubt the correctness of these conclusions, considering the subject from every aspect—that is, both in view of the facts established by the record and the necessary operation and effect of the law as we have construed it.

In the American Tobacco Co. case the Supreme Court held:

That the combination in and of itself, as well as each and all the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately, be decreed to be in restraint of trade, an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization within the first and second sections of the antitrust act.

It directed the court below to hear the parties by evidence or otherwise-as it may be deemed proper for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating out of the elements now composing it a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law.

And again the court decreed:

Pending the bringing about of the result just stated, each and all of the defendants, individuals as well as corporations, should be restrained from doing any act which might further extend or enlarge the power of combination by any means or device whatsoever. In view of the considerations we have stated, we leave the matter to the court below to work out a compliance with the law without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property.

It seems to be incomprehensible that these companies and their officials did not know that their course of business was both a violation of the law of the land and of every principle of good conscience. That the American Tobacco Co. and its officers and constituent companies were within the prohibitions of the law can not be questioned.

The Supreme Court says:

That they were, in our opinion, so overwhelmingly results from the undisputed facts, that it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion.

AUTHORITY OF CONGRESS.

Those who are opposed to the adoption of this resolution base their opposition upon the fact that there are three coordinate branches of our Government; that they are separate and independent; and that Congress has no right to interfere with the administration of either of the other departments. In a limited sense this may be true, but that this independence goes to the extent of forbidding Congress from describing and defining the duties to be performed by any of the departments of the executive branch of the Government or by the officials of the court I deny. The Department of Justice was created by the Congress. The two Houses prescribed by statutes formally passed the administrative duties which it was to perform.

The power to create implies the power to modify, to destroy, or to amplify. It would, indeed, be a strange proposition if the Department of Justice could be so separate and independent from the Congress that we could not add to or take from its duties or its prerogatives. If we have power to prescribe by statute what they may be, what impropriety is there in declaring what the sense of Congress is in directing the Attorney General to begin certain litigation, when, in the judgment of the Congress, it ought to be begun?

This is not a new question. We have abundance of precedents. I need only refer to a few.

On July 13, 1892 (vol. 27 U. S. Stat. L., p. 126), the Attorney General was-

General was—Authorized and directed to institute the necessary legal proceedings against the Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Co., its successors and assigns. * * under the treaty with the Delaware Indians May 30, 1860, * * for damage done the said Indians in the taking and destruction of their property by the said railroad company.

On March 2, 1895 (vol. 28 U. S. Stat. L., p. 898), in the act providing for the fulfillment of the treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes in the suit of the Choctaws and Chickasaws for ceded lands of Wichita Indians, Congress said:

The Attorney General is hereby directed to appear in behalf of the Government of the United States.

And added:

It shall be the duty of the Attorney General, within 10 days after the filing of the petition by the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to give notice to the Wichitas and affiliated bands that they are made defendants, etc.

Again, on March 2, 1895 (vol. 28 U. S. Stat. L., ch. 177), in re the account of moneys due the Cherokee Nation under certain Indian treaties and laws passed by Congress for the purpose of carrying such treaties into effect, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1893, and reported to Congress in House Executive Document No. 182, Fifty-second Congress, the Congress said:

Such claims shall be referred to the Attorney General, and he is hereby authorized and directed to review the conclusions of law reached by the Department of the Interior in such account and report his conclusions thereon to Congress at its next regular session.

Again, in an act making appropriations for Government expenses (vol. 29, U. S. Stat. L., p. 185), Congress provided:

SEC. 22. It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to make an investigation as respects the compensation to be paid, in salary or otherwise, to clerks of the United States circuit courts or district courts, and he shall report on the first day of the next session of the present Congress a plan for the fixing of the compensation of the clerks of the several courts of the United States as he may deem just.

Again, in (vol. 35, ch. 263, p. 807, U. S. Stat. L., 60th Cong.) another Choctaw Indian case, Fleming v. McCurtain, Congress

The Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to immediately move the advancement upon the docket of the United States Supreme Court of the case of J. E. Fleming and others against Green McCurtain and others to the earliest possible hearing.

And again, in the Sixtieth Congress, Senate resolution 48 was passed, authorizing and directing the Attorney General to institute and prosecute litigation to enforce the rights and remedies of the United States of America arising and growing out of certain land grants. (Vol. 47, pt. 3, Congressional Record, p. 2069.)

But why should we multiply further precedents? We have here examples of the Congress of the United States not only directing the Attorney General to begin and to prosecute certain litigation, but the Congress has even gone to the extent of specifically directing him to immediately move the advancement upon the docket of the United States Supreme Court of the case of Fleming v. Green McCurtain to the earliest possible

What excuse can be given for a failure to prosecute the officials of these combinations who have for 20 years and more been flagrantly and willfully violating the law of the land? It is not a case of uncertainty of the law. It is a case of the open defiance of the law. The Attorney General has not hesitated to enforce the criminal provisions of the Sherman statute in other cases, why does he do it here? In other cases he has acted upon what, I dare say, is purely ex parte testimony, and no criticism can be made for so doing. In these cases there has been an adjudication, and the court has declared that the statutes have been violated. The Attorney General himself no longer contends that the law is uncertain, because in a recent article published in the February number of the Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine, on page 616, he says:

There is, of course, some genuine discontent with the Sherman law, but I suspect most of it arises not so much from any real uncertainty as to its meaning as from a realization of that meaning.

The truth of the matter is that the department has failed to enforce the law in the past, and these great corporations have presumed upon their vastness and power as a guarantee against any prosecution by the Government. Under the force of public opinion the civil suits were begun and the Government has won. Is that victory to be thrown away now? If the Department of Justice is really in earnest, ought not this criminal provision to be enforced in order that it may be an example to all others who may be tempted to violate the law in the same manner?

The course of the department with reference to the American Tobacco Co. is peculiarly interesting. The suit was begun against this company, 2 English corporations, 65 American corporations, and 29 individuals. They spent millions of money in purchasing some plants not for the purpose of operating them but for the purpose of closing them. The Supreme Court says they spent $4,000,000 in what was known as the plugtobacco war, until they either drove their competitors into bankruptcy or forced them to sell to the combination. They absorbed between 200 and 250 different corporations and companies. They drove the price of raw material down to a point to suit their convenience, and they increased prices to their consumers at will, without any regard to either supply or demand. They were permitted to continue their illegal methods until they had an accumulation of property and estates amounting to over $300,000,000, and controlled, approximately. 80 per cent of the business of the United States in tobacco and allied products and a large proportion of the foreign business. All of these matters are known to the department.

After the American Tobacco Co. became so huge and had killed off or absorbed the most of its large competitors, it continued its war, by means fair and foul, to cut down the price of tobacco below the cost of production.

Some years ago they went into Kentucky, reduced the price of tobacco, and fraudulently claimed that they had on hand sufficient stock to last them two or three years. Thus they were able to buy and did buy the entire crop at about 61 cents per When the farmers learned that they had been deceived, they formed pool agreements, and withheld the tobacco crops for a couple of years, and by virtue of this pooling agreement succeeded for the time being in bringing the American Tobacco Co. to terms and sold 75 per cent of their crops to the American Tobacco Co. for 17½ cents per pound, and the balance they sold to the independent companies at the same price. The American Tobacco Co. wanted the whole of the crop, but the Kentucky farmers refused to sell them more than 75 per cent and retained 25 per cent for the independent manufacturers, and sold it to them at the same price.

Out of this pooling agreement sprung what were known as the night riders, many of whom were farmers and business and professional men in good standing.

The Attorney General sent a special agent from the Department of Justice to prosecute these night riders, and eight of them-farmers-were indicted, tried, convicted, and fined, in the aggregate, $3,500 for a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Most of these facts appear in the hearings before the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the Department of Justice on House resolution No. 103.

On page 53, Congressman Cantrill, in his examination of Attorney General Wickersham, brought out the following facts:

Mr. Cantrill. I would like to ask you. Mr. Attorney General, if this investigation and this trial of these tobacco farmers in Kentucky originated with your department here? Were these cases taken up at the suggestion of your department here?

Mr. Wickersham, Yes: they were taken up as the result of complaints made to me, and I sent an investigator down there and the investigation resulted in those indictments.

Mr. Cantrill. But the investigation—

Mr. Wickersham. And they proceeded from the department.

Mr. Cantrill. (continuing). Came directly from the department here?

Mr. Wickersham. Yes, sir.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANTRILL. It was at your instigation that these cases were taken up?
21r. WICKERSHAM. Yes, sir; they were the so-called night-rider

Mr. Cantrill. As I understand it, these men were indicted under the criminal section of the antitrust law? Mr. Wickersham. Yes. Mr. Cantrill. And, as you state in your report, on page 3, were fined

Mr. Wickersham (interposing). $3,500 in the aggregate.
Mr. Cantrill. The eight farmers?
Mr. Wickersham. Yes, sir.
Mr. Cantrill. Since you have been Attorney General has there been any criminal prosecution of any officer or director of the American Tobacco Co.? Has any officer been indicted under the criminal section of the antitrust law?
Mr. Wickersham. They have not.

On page 56 of these same hearings occurs the following:

On page 56 of these same hearings occurs the following:

Mr. Cantella. As a matter of fact, under your administration it is only the tobacco farmer who has been proceeded against under the criminal section of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. Wickersham. That is a fact.

Mr. Cantella. There is no manufacturer, no officer or director of the American Tobacco Co., who has been proceeded against, and the only man who has been proceeded against under the criminal section is the tobacco farmer in Kentucky. Is that a fact?

Mr. Wickersham. Yes; and the tobacco farmer was proceeded against on a specific charge—that is, these particular people, if they were farmers, were proceeded against on the specific charge of naving interfered with an interstate shipment of tobacco by another farmer.

Mr. Cantella. Well, that is the only instance under the criminal section?

Mr. Wickersham. That is the only instance relating to the tobacco bushess.

The purpose of the night riders, as I understand it, was in part to limit production and to control the sale. If these acts extended in their operation beyond the State lines, they were clearly a violation of law, and I am not here complaining of the fact that the Attorney General saw fit to prosecute the the fact that the Attorney General saw it to prosecute the transgressors. But he knew that this pooling agreement and the night riders were but a protest against the exactions of the American Tobacco Co., because, on page 62 of the same hearings, he was asked the following question by the chairman:

The Chairman. According to your understanding, what was the supposed cause of the alleged lawlessness down in the State of Kentucky in connection with this tobacco case?

Mr. Wickensham. Mr. Cantralla knows much better than I do, but my general understanding of it is that it is the result of the combination of the tobacco dealers.

Mr. Cantralla. Practically 30 per cent.

Mr. Wickensham. Now, that being the case, one of the evil consequences of the combination was that the growers got together in a combination for the purpose of meeting the power which the purchaser exercised—combination for the purpose of meeting the power which the purchaser exercised—

Mr. Cantrill. Will you permit me to add that the growers got together under an express act of the legislature passed in 1906?

Mr. Wickersham. First you got together without the act, but subsequently the State of Kentucky passed a law authorizing it. But certain of the farmers would not come in, and force and violence—I speak now without personal knowledge, but from knowledge obtained from the public prints—was resorted to, either to punish those who would not come in or to prevent them from shipping, and in some cases went to the destruction of their crops and to interference with their shipments.

The Chairman. This alleged combination, then, through the agency of the tobacco company, was a violation of the Sherman antitrust law? Mr. Wickersham. That is what has resulted in the recent decision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri? Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if he is aware of the fact that at the time those farmers were endeavoring to hold their tobacco crop in order to force a proper price from this monopoly, the monopoly, in order to meet that situation, had gone into other States, notably into the State of Missouri, had leased in the names of its agents vast tracts of ground, had made large investments in storehouses, and had employed hundreds of thousands of men in order that it might be prepared with an independent source of supply, so that it could set at defiance all of the efforts of the farmers of Kentucky to protect themselves?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I knew that as a matter of general information, though I did not have at hand the details.

So it appears that while these farmers bound themselves together, under the authority of a Kentucky statute, in order to defend themselves against the exactions of the powerful American Tobacco Co. Trust, they were prosecuted, while the men who organized the American Tobacco Co. and made a combination of over $300,000,000 in property and assets, and by cutthroat competition forced their competitors either into bankruptcy or to sell to the combination are to go unwhipped of

But this is not all. After the Supreme Court had handed down its decision dissolving the American Tobacco Co. into its constituent elements it was given out by the friends of the Attorney General that the tobacco people and their trust mag-to him on account of this and other prosecutions. This was before he and the circuit court had approved the plan of reorganization and recombination.

Think for one moment of the situation. One parent company, 65 American companies, 2 English companies, and 29 individual defendants, each of whom is a stockholder in the parent company and all of the constituent companies, owning and controlling a gigantic business, with an accumulation of more than $300,000,000 of assets and controlling the business, which had been formerly owned by from 200 to 250 separate firms and corporations, a part of whom were bought out by the trust and others driven out of business by its cuthroat prac-The Supreme Court directed the circuit court to determine upon "some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating out of the elements now composing it a new condition, which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law." This certainly did not mean reorganization in the sense of recombination.

The Supreme Court said the combination "in and of itself, as well as each and all of the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately," violated the law.

Is it conceivable that the Supreme Court would dissolve this combination and its constituent elements, which were found to be violating the law, only to let them again recombine under the sanction of the law? Are they to be permitted by a lower court and the Attorney General to undo what the Supreme Court had done or to legalize what the Supreme Court had declared was illegal?

The plan approved by the Attorney General permitted a recombination into 14 separate organizations of a business which theretofore had been owned and controlled by more than 200 separate firms and corporations. Can such a plan be a re-creation of a new condition that is "honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law"? The Attorney General must have understood that the Supreme Court had ordered a disorganization and not a reorganization or a recombination.

In the hearings upon House resolution No. 103, to which I have heretofore referred, on page 60, occur the following question and answer:

Mr. Cantrill. However, they (the defendants in the American To-bacco Co. case) are to be permitted to organize within six months under rules laid down by the court, and those rules will possibly permit them to keep a working agreement?

Mr. Wickersham. That is absolutely not right; because the order of the court is not for reorganization, but for disorganization.

And yet the Attorney General approves of the reorganization of all of these companies into 14 different and distinct companies having the same stockholders.

True, the plan approved provides that the 14 companies, which are authorized, shall not have the same directors, but they have the same stockholders, among whom are the 29 individual defendants. They have the same community of interest in all of these corporations. Is it to be supposed for one moment that they are going to elect directors who will act out of harmony with the wishes of the stockholders who elect them? Are these 14 companies, with many of the same stockholders and with directors of their choosing, going to compete among themselves, as we understand the meaning of the word "compete"? Will any company do anything that is going to jeopardize the interests of the other companies or of their stockholders? To answer these questions in the affirmative is to deny all the knowledge that we can derive from human experience.

This plan of reorganization was disapproved by the independent tobacco interests, who were the real complaining parties. It was disapproved by the attorneys general of six sovereign tobacco-growing States, and, if I am rightly informed, it was disapproved by some of the associate counsel of the Government. The independent tobacco interests number 100,000 men and more, and they have invested millions of dollars. Their business has been jeopardized for years by the operation of the American Tobacco Co. Their representatives and the attorneys general of six sovereign States protested against the approval of the plan and pleaded with the Attorney General to take an appeal to the Supreme Court. Their petitions were denied, and he arbitrarily refuses to continue the litigation, mooted though it was, and has taken no steps, so far as the public knows, looking to a criminal prosecution of any of these officials who have so flagrantly violated the law of the land.

Surely, when the Attorney General assumes this attitude, the officials of the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co., who became so angry with the Attorney General that they would scarcely speak to him before the reorganization, are not in a position now to complain.

This is clearly proven by the stock quotations of the two nates, who had formerly been his friends, would scarcely speak | companies. In November, 1908, when the suit was begun against the Standard Oil Co., its stock was quoted at $550 per share. After the decree of the Supreme Court was handed down dissolving the corporation and declaring it to be a trust the stock was quoted at $679 per share, and within a few days it sold as high as $950 per share, and the price of oil has been constantly increasing

Does this look as if the 33 companies into which the Standard Oil Co. has been dissolved are actually competing? What benefit is the public receiving from this so-called dissolution?

Or, let us refer to the American Tobacco Co. The par value of its stock was $100 per share. The highest price to which it had risen before the decision of the Supreme Court declaring it to be a trust in violation of the Sherman antitust law was $2528 per share. After the decision of the Supreme Court it. $528 per share. After the decision of the Supreme Court it fell to its lowest point—$364 per share.

But on November 27, 1911—within two weeks after the Attorney General had approved the plan for the recombination the same stock rose to $511 per share; and within a few days thereafter it rose even above the highest market price it had attained before the decision. I do not have the exact figures.

If the Attorney General has so managed this litigation that the price of the stock after the litigation is ended is higher than it was at any time before, surely the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. will not wound his sensibilities by further complaining. If, as in the American Tobacco Co. case, he has clothed with legal sanction 14 combinations, whose elements before the approval of the plan were existing in violation of the law, we can account for the increase in the price of the stock of the old company. And if he, being the head of the Department of Justice, refuses to enforce the criminal provisions of the statute against the officials of the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co., whose wealth has accumulated and increased largely because of its violations of this statute, certainly they, the worshipers of the golden calf, ought to kill the fatted calf for this prodigal son. Has he not placed the American Tobacco officials under untold obligations when he prosecuted the farmers who formed an organization for the purpose of preventing the sale and delivery of their tobacco to the American Tobacco Co. at such prices as it might dictate and fails to prosecute criminally the company organized as a combination and trust which refused to pay the farmers the value of their product?

I confess I do not understand why tobacco growers who, for their own self-protection, are forced into a combination in order to protect themselves against the greed and ravages of the American Tobacco Co. should be prosecuted, while the officials of that company, who manufacture and sell the finished prod-uct, should be shielded by the Government. The American public does not understand it, and I do not believe the President of the United States understands it.

On October 28, 1911, while the President was on his western tour, in a speech in Chicago on the subject of the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law, he said:

It is not within my discretion as an executive officer to suspend any statute that stands upon the statute books. I am here under my oath, taken to defend the Constitution and the laws of the United States, to enforce the law, and when I find it violated to prosecute or direct prosecution of those who violate it.

No President could take any other position. The criminal provisions of the statute are just as much a part of the law of the land as are the civil remedies. But the Attorney General, the head of the Department of Justice-the man who sits at his Cabinet table and is sworn to faithfully discharge the duties of his office-takes it upon himself to attempt to enforce the civil provisions of the statute and to suspend its criminal provisions

Think of the situation. For years prior to 1890 there had been a protest all over this land because of the great trusts and combinations and the wrongful methods in which they were doing their business, and this protest was crystallized into the form of the Sherman antitrust law. Congress formally enacted it as a statute. To Congress it seemed that in order to provide an efficient remedy against the growing evils, it was necessary to provide both civil and criminal remedies. In this instance, after long years of patient waiting, a civil prosecution was at last begun against the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. The highest court in the land finds that the criminal provisions of the statute have been violated. And yet the Attorney General ignores the statute, pays no attention to the findings of the Supreme Court, at least seems to go counter to the opinion of the President, as expressed in his Chicago speech, and suspends the operation of the criminal law.

Upon what meat doth this our Wickersham feed that he hath grown so great?

Mr. President, it may seem that I am unduly exercised in this matter, but my position is not due to any spirit of revenge.

I do not know any of these delinquent defendants. None of them have ever harmed me or laid a straw in my way, but I believe that public duty requires the criminal prosecution of these men, just as certainly as it was necessary to begin the civil prosecutions, and that it is the duty of the Congress to so

The public press reports Judge E. H. Gary, the head of the United States Steel Corporation, as having said at a dinner of the Lehigh Club, New York, on Saturday, February 10:

We of great power and influence in the affairs of the country have not all of us done the fair thing.

Unless capitalists, corporations, rich men, powerful men themselves take a leading part in trying to improve conditions of humanity great changes will come, and they will come mighty quickly, and the mob will bring them.

He might have added that this danger will be increased if the Attorney General will not do his duty. I do not share these views to the same extent as Judge Gary, but they present food

We can not deny that there is a feeling of unrest prevailing throughout the land. On every side we hear murmurings of discontent. Socialism is rapidly increasing, not, in my judg-ment, because of the merit of its principles, but because the Socialists are able to point to the flagrant violations of the law by such vast combinations of capital as the Standard Oil Co., the American Tobacco Co., and others, and to the fact that the Government permits them to continue without enforcing the remedies which are at hand, while it holds to strict account offenders of lesser influence in the financial and political world. A just Government and a faithful officer can not permit it to be said that the rich and the strong are favorites before the law.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5382.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the purposes of discussion

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unaninous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that be simply for the purpose of permitting me to go on and to address the Senate in accordance with my notice

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the purpose of permitting the Senator from Utah to now speak.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. Mr. President; I desire that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the bill. I will say to the Senator from Georgia, however, that there is no intention of pressing it to a vote or to attempt to press it to a vote to-day, but I want to make some headway with it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that the Senator could at this time make it the unfinished business in any sense.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And under the notice that I have given I suppose that the proper course would be to permit me to present my views on the subject at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Utah is in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall not interfere with the Senator from Georgia. As soon as the motion is disposed of I shall yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. BACON. Although the motion of the Senator from Utah is in order, the universal practice of the Senate is that where a Senator has given notice that he will address the Senate, not to interpose anything to interfere with his so doing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the motion is going to lead to any discussion, I will withdraw it. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah withdraws the motion. The Mr. BACON. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President— The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Georgia. Mr. BACON. I understand that. I rose to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT, The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Smoot Stephenson Sutherland Thornton Tillman Townsend Warren Watson Wetmore Williams Curtis O'Gorman Bourne Briggs Bristow Oliver Overman Owen Fall Fletcher Foster Gore Gronna Guggenheim Page Perkins Poindexter Reed Root Brown Bryan Burton Catron McCumber McCumber Martine, N. J. Myers Newlands Nixon Chamberlain Sanders Clapp Clark, Wyo. Shively Culberson Cummins Smith, Ga.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and his colleague [Mr. ASHURST] have been called from the Chamber on important to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the proposed Federal compensation bill is made applicable to injuries resulting in disability or death of employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce while such employees are employed in such commerce.

am opposed to the bill in its present form, because it would prove a serious loss to the men working for railroads.

It would become their exclusive remedy for injuries, thereby taking away from them their present rights.

It would leave the employee where he must still frequently litigate. It would require the trial of his case before a Federal special master called an adjuster and prevent his contracting

It would arbitrarily reduce his recovery to about one-third of what he is now entitled to; it would greatly reduce the recovery of his family if he is killed, and allow payments only by the month instead of in a bulk sum, except where a petition is presented to a Federal court judge and he, for cause shown, directs monthly payments commuted to a lump sum.

Now, as the proposed bill becomes the exclusive remedy if it is passed, it is well at the outset to consider what are the present rights of employees of railroad companies. Ever since the decision in Priestly v. Fowler a contest has been going on between the employees and the employers, the employers seeking to build more and more technical defenses to prevent employees from recovering in cases of injuries; the employees seeking to check those defenses. The employers have to a large extent been successful before the courts in building up these defenses, due, in my opinion, chiefly to the fact that their trained counsel were specialists and their views of the law as a rule were presented with more ability than the views presented on the other side. But we have gotten away from Priestly v. Fowler, and we have gotten away from all these decisions, for by the acts of Congress the rights of employees are established so far as they can be established by acts of

In 1906 the first employers' liability act was passed. The Supreme Court heard a case involving its constitutionality in 1908 and held it to be unconstitutional. At once Congress passed the second employers' liability act, seeking to meet the constitutional criticism placed upon the first act by the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1910 Congress passed an amendment to the employers' liability act. In 1908 at Atlantic City a large number of counsel of railroad companies met and or-ganized to fight the employers' liability act of 1908, and able counsel were selected to conduct the litigation through to the Supreme Court. During the present term of the Supreme Court, in the case of Mondou v. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway Co., in the month of January of the present year, the court sustained the constitutionality of the employers' liability act of The decision also goes far enough to sustain the amendment to the act. Congress also passed the safety-appliance acts. Those acts have been continuously before the courts and have been attacked by the railread companies. Only during the present session of the Supreme Court have the safety-appliance acts been passed upon and fully and broadly sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, the court holding that they apply not alone to cars and engines engaged in interstate commerce, but to all cars and engines used by railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, whether the particular cars were used in interstate or intrastate commerce. So the rights of employees under existing law have only become settled during the past few weeks, and only from now on are the employees to receive the beneficial effect to its full extent of this wise legislation by Congress.

Let us consider these acts and see where they leave the rights or employees. The present employers' liability act provides that railroad companies shall be liable to employees or their personal representatives for injury or death "resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment." of employees. The present employers' liability act provides that

So that the doctrine of nonliability for the negligence of a fellow employee has been abolished.

Again, the act provides that the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.

So that the defense of contributory negligence by railroad companies is gone, and even though an employee is guilty of contributory negligence, he is entitled to recover the amount of his damage, to be reduced in proportion to his negligence.

Again, the employers' liability act provides that the employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any cases where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of the employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

I will a little later consider the safety-appliance act and show that it broadly covers nearly every point upon a train where an employee is likely to be injured, and that it does away with the doctrine of assumed risk and frees the employee from loss of his case because he knew the defective condition of machinery.

The employers' liability act provides that any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void.

So that no device, no contract, no scheme of the railroad company can be prepared or put through by which the rights of the employee can be destroyed.

The amendment of 1910 provides that suit may be brought in the United States court in the district of the residence of the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be doing business at the time of commencing such action. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States, and no case arising under this act and brought in any States, court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States.

This amendment to the employers' liability act gives the right to the employee to sue in his own State court, usually in his own county or in the place where the accident happened, and the case can not be removed to a United States court, thus placing upon the employee the additional expense of trying his case at a distance from his home, or at a distance from the point where his witnesses live, with the expense of bringing his witnesses and paying their railroad fare and paying in advance their per diem witness fees. This burden has been taken off the employee.

Again, the employers' liability act and the amendment provide that the right of action given to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative.

Now, let us come to the safety-appliance acts. and require to be kept in safe condition driving-power brakes operated from the cab, continuous-power brakes, suitable couplers, grab-iron handholds, standard height of drawbars, boilers of locomotives and appurtenances, secure steps on cars, secure car ladders, running boards, ash pans on engines, and so forth.

The present law safeguards the rights of employee and authorizes recovery in every instance of an injury, except one of pure accident and due solely to the negligence of the injured employee.

With the safety-appliance law and the employers' liability act the defenses which heretofore have stood so seriously in the way of an injured employee are gone. But the employees have not yet received the benefit of this law. The Supreme Court has just sustained it. The statistics which the gentlemen bring covering past years are not statistics under the full operation of the present Federal law applicable to employees. Lawyers all over the country have been afraid to use the employers' liability act. They have not believed that the safetyappliance act would be construed to mean what it has been construed to mean, but now in their broadest language both have been unanimously sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The relations of an employer under existing laws, if engaged in interstate commerce, if engaged in that line of work which Congress has power to regulate, are practically established. With the defenses gone that formerly existed we may reasonably expect that the railroad companies will settle with their men as never before; that litigation will not exist as it has heretofore existed in matters of injuries to employees of railroad companies.

The complaint has been made that much of what they gained in law suits heretofore has been wasted in counsel fees. Litigation ought not longer to take place in anything like the quantity that it has heretofore, and with their claims brought substantially to a fixed status, with the defenses that made them so doubtful in the past gone, if they are compelled to sue, their fees will be contracted for like fees in other business matters where the liability is practically assured and will necessarily be brought to a far smaller per cent than they have been in the Under existing laws employees are entitled to recover all of their financial loss, and compensation for pain and suffering and deformity. The compensation for pain and suffering and deformity will average one-half as much as the compensation for financial loss.

If this bill were not intended to provide an exclusive remedy, I would not object to it. I object to it as an exclusive remedy because it is to wipe out the existing rights of employees, so admirably preserved by acts of Congress and completely sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

First, I object to the new remedy that is given as a substitute for the old. Let us see what it is:

By the proposed bill the right to sue in a State court is withdrawn and the right of trial by jury is practically abolished. A new officer is created, who is to be found in every United States district throughout the country where suits of this sort may originate in that district. He is called an adjuster. Why he is called an adjuster I can not understand. The term is misleading. He is nothing more nor less than a Federal court master to sit and try cases. The employee can bring his case nowhere except before this Federal court master. Those who have had any experience in suits for employees before Federal court masters usually do not desire any more experience of that kind. Yet the only place that the employee can take his case is to a Federal court master.

This man called an adjuster sits as a judge. He holds the Witnesses are subpensed just as they would be subcourt. penned before any other master. They are to be examined just as they would be examined before any other master in a trial in a Federal court. If the witness is a hundred miles off, he can be brought by subpena, but the employee has to pay his railroad fare. He has to tender it to him before he comes and tender him a day's witness fees before he can get him.

I find no provision in the bill to reach a witness farther than 100 miles from the special master called the adjuster. The trial takes place. Exceptions can be filed, and the case can be carried to the district court.

If the employee carries it up, he must pay in advance $5 court costs to the clerk. If he wants a jury, he must pay $5 more and make a written demand for a jury trial. Either side can take the case up. A trial before the United States district court follows and that trial is to be a de novo trial. All the witnesses must be brought again. They must be examined again. Two trials in every case can be forced on an employee before he can recover as a matter of right from the railroad company, and he must stand the burden of two complete trials before he can get a judgment. Then the cases can go up in ordinary order by exceptions as far to higher courts as either party desires to take them.

The master can tax the costs as he sees fit. The costs can be taxed in the higher court, but there is a provision that if the railroad company agrees to pay a certain sum and the employee does not recover more, all the costs fall on the employee. is no provision in the bill that if an employee offers to take a certain sum and recovers that much all the costs must fall on the employer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator is evidently in error in saying that the bill as reported to the Senate provides for the case to which he refers, where all the costs fall on the employee. The bill simply provides that the costs of the employee shall not be taxed against the employer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then they will be taxed on the other side, will they not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is simply that he shall not tax his costs, not the costs of the employer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As to the costs of the case, I will not stop to discuss that in detail. I will consent for the Senator's suggestion of correction to go into the Record without stopping to discuss it in detail. I expect to discuss this bill very much in detail, section by section, later on.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANDERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.
Mr. REED. I simply want to state that the copy of the bill which I have received, the only copy I have seen, and which was handed to me here from the Secretary's desk, does contain a provision as stated by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Missouri had listened to what I said, he would have heard me say "the bill as reported to the Senate." The Judiciary Committee struck out of the bill the provision to which the Senator from Georgia refers, and the bill as proposed to be amended by the Judiciary Committee simply provides that where the employer offers to allow a certain sum and the employee does not recover more than that sum, the employee shall not tax his cost against the employer, but the employer must, of course, pay his own costs.

Mr. REED. May I inquire if the bill as reported has ever been printed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; the Senator will find it in his file, together with the report of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but I want to say that I was listening to what the Senator from Utah said, and I referred to the fact because I want to get all the light I can. I am glad the bill has been modified to that extent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I read the bill and I gathered from the bill that the purpose was to release the employer from costs if the employee recovered no more than the employer offered to pay. There is no provision that the employee shall be relieved from costs if he recovers all that he offered to take.

Again, while the employer can obtain a trial by jury on a written demand in the United States court the report of the master is prima facie correct, and it is necessary for the employee to overcome that report by proof, so that his trial by jury comes to him in the Federal court burdened by the judgment of this Federal court master. If this bill is to pass I would insist that there should at least be reserved to the employees the privilege of bringing their suits in a State court before a State court jury, and that the remedy of taking their cases to a Federal court master should not be exclusive.

Again, in connection with the procedure of securing their rights, the bill provides that no contract can be made by them for counsel. Not only may they make no contract for counsel that is binding, but no lien of any kind can be created and no judgment enforced on any amount allowed to them. They must come to the Federal court without the right to employ counsel and make a contract with him, and without a right to bind in any way their recovery for their counsel fees, and the fees are to be fixed by the master, with no provision as to their collection.

In this connection I wish to refer also to the fact that the compensation is to come to them monthly, and in no instance more than one-half their salary, unless their earnings were less than $50. They are to receive monthly for a total disability only onehalf the salary they earned, and it is to be paid monthly. hundred dollars is arbitrarily fixed as the largest sum an employee of a railroad company shall be considered as making and $50 a month is arbitrarily fixed as the largest sum an em-ployee can recover for a total disability.

Let us see what they call a total disability. Both eyes completely and permanently out; both legs cut off; both hands cut off. I think these disabilities can well be classed as permanent and total. There are a large number of injuries that are not classified. There are a number that are classified, but there are many which are not classified.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, does the Sentor from Georgia say that the injuries he has just enumerated are the only ones?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said there were others. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SWITHERLAND. I misunderstood the Schator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said there were a number of others that were classified, but that there were a large number of others that were not classified and could not be classified.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But if they result in total disability they come within the provisions of the bill as such.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely; but I was citing the cases of total disability defined in the bill to show what an extreme standard of total disabilities it sets up.

I will cite another case of total disability named in the proposed bill. An injury to the spine which produces total paralysis in both legs. There is the standard of total disability. What about injuries to the spine that do not create total paralysis of both legs and yet which produce total disability? All those will be for the master's consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, the intention of the framers of this bill was that any injury which in fact resulted in permanent total disability should be considered as such, and payments should be continued to the employee, as the bill provides, as long as he lives. But in order that

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator pardon me? do not misunderstand the bill, and I will discuss it just on the lines the Senator is expressing himself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was simply a preliminary. I was going to make the further suggestion to the Senator that the purpose of stating particular and certain injuries is that under no circumstances shall the adjuster or the court be permitted to say, when those injuries result, that they did not constitute permanent total disability. Those specific provisions were put in the bill out of abundance of caution to make it absolutely certain that when an injury of that kind happened it can never be said to be other than a total permanent disability and not in any way to limit the general provision with reference to total permanent disability.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection with the description of this adjuster as an officer, would it not be more accurate to describe him as a referee? A master we generally understand to be an officer of a chancery court and a referee an officer of a court of law. These cases necessarily will come to the law side of the court, and would not the adjuster be better described as a referee appointed by the court rather than a master?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think any benefit is derived from calling him a referee. There are so many Federal masters in the Federal courts, and the work that the adjuster is to do, being exactly the same as a special master would perform, although his report is to be to the common-law side of the court, I think a comprehension of his power is better understood by comparing him to a special master, and that was my reason for selecting that term. He might be called a referee also. He is given, however, judicial power.

Mr. BACON. If my colleague will permit me, I will suggest that in cases where railroads have gone into the hands of a receiver and there are a great many claims against the road for personal injuries, they are universally referred to a master. Mr. FLETCHER. Those cases are always on the equity side of the court

Mr. BACON. I know; and they were tried under the commonlaw liability.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the jurisdiction of the equity side of the court.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is utterly immaterial what name you give him, he is appointed by the Federal judge with trial power and judicial authority, and an adjuster is a misnomer for him.

I was calling attention to the fact that the cases conceded to be permanent total disability cases are most extreme cases. They may have been declared to be permanent total disability out of the kindly consideration of the commission. How any living human being could have treated them as less passes my imagination. They are made the standards for this United States court judicial officer, by which he is to compare other injuries and allow an unreasonable small recovery to the employee of the unreasonable small part which under any circumstances this bill gives to an injured employee. The amount is so trifling, the chance of litigation so great before the adjuster or master, that there is nothing left from which to employ a counsel. In the vast number of cases of injuries, where the extent of the injury is not described in the bill and where the specific recovery is in no way indicated, each one of these little masters will fix the standard, with the able counsel for the railroads trained and feed by the year, prepared to appeal their side and drag down the standard of payment to employees with no provision made for compensation to a lawyer representing the employee and practically a provision which prevents the employee from having a lawyer

It anything like the reduction permitted in this bill goes through it is excused, as I understand it, upon the theory that the lawyers in damage suits have received about half of past recoveries. If you take the half away from the employee, because before his lawyer got it, then certainly you ought to provide in the bill that wherever a trial has to take place before one of these special masters or anywhere else the fee of the employee's lawyer should be fixed by the court and made an additional charge against the railroad company.

I am utterly opposed to a bill that turns these men over exclusively to the tender mercies of this Federal court master or compensation.

referee, and I am utterly opposed to a bill that leaves them without a chance for representation somewhat commensurate to the representation which will be on the other side.

I desire to come now to the amount this bill proposes to allow. It arbitrarily declares that no man shall be considered as making over $100 a month. For a permanent total disability he can get a monthly payment of half the hundred-of $50 a month-and no more, even if he was earning $250 a Conceding the permanent total disability, his compensation is to be monthly only one-half what he was making, and he is arbitrarily to be determined as not having been mak ing over $100 a month. What about the engineers all over this land who make $200 a month? Arbitrarily you say if you cut off both of his legs or both of his hands, if you injure him in the spine so that both legs are permanently paralyzed, you will treat him as having been making only $100 a month, and you will allow him for that injury only half of that sum-$50 a month.

Mr. OVERMAN. For eight years?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; for life.

Mr. OVERMAN. Permanently.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am treating now the compensation to the employee if he lives. I do not think it is right to pass a bill that arbitrarily fixes the amount of a man's salary at onehalf what he was making when you are proposing to compensate You call it the workmen's compensation bill and you shape it so that he is not compensated at all; there is nothing for pain and suffering, nothing for deformity. His salary is arbitrarily reduced at the very outset one-half. You treat him as making only $100 a month when he was making $200, and then you arbitrarily say he shall have only half of that $100.

Come now to injuries that you call permanent partial injuries, cutting an engineer's leg off at or above the knee. I take that as an illustration.

The loss by separation of one leg at or above the knee joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one leg, 66 months.

To the engineer making $2,400 a year, for cutting his leg off above the knee the proposed bill will pay only $3,300; to the fireman or train hand making $50 a month it will pay $1,650; and the sums will be paid monthly at the rate of $50 and $25.

The loss by separation of one foot at or above the ankle joint, or the permanent and complete loss of the use of one foot, 48 months.

This will be $2,400 to the engineer, $1,200 to the man making $50 a month.

Take an engineer 45 years old. He is master of his business. He is too old to learn another occupation. You cut his leg off just below the knee. His business is gone, his occupation is gone. What can he do? Yet you give him $2,400 for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. And that $2,400 is paid monthly?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is paid monthly at $50 a month. The proposed bill does not give him any lump sum and let him start out and find something to make his living. It gives it to him monthly, and it leaves him to starve at the end of the time—that, too, although he was absolutely free from fault and injured exclusively by the negligence of the railroad Take the complete loss of one eye. This bill will give him only $1,500, payable monthly. Let an engineer 45 years old lose one eye and he is out of a job; he can not stand an examination for an engineer's place anywhere. The proposed bill will give him less than a year's pay at $50 a month, and leave him, with his business gone, unable to obtain or fill a place or to stand any of the examinations prescribed for an engineer.

Take a young apprentice, 20 years old, making $50 a month. For the loss of his leg above the knee this bill allows him $1,640; below the knee, $1,200. No consideration is given to his future prospects. But that is not all. If his employer offers him any kind of work and offers him 90 per cent of what he was earning before he was hurt, this bill requires him to take it; and when he takes it he does not get any other pay, and if he declines to take it he forfeits his pay.

The Supplier LAND. No, Mr. President, the Senator is

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President, the Senator is greatly mistaken about that.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me call the Senator's attention to the language of the proposition as it comes to us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You must have misunderstood me.

am sure my statement was correct; but go on. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understood the Senator to say that if an employee declined to work he would forfeit his compensa-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is, if he declines to take a job, during the time that it is offered to him he does not get the

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will permit me to say he is entirely mistaken about that. The provision of section

That, notwithstanding any agreement, award, finding, or judgment as hereinbefore provided for, the employer may continue such injured employee in his service at suitable work, and if the employee accept such work and continue in his employer's service, compensation in any case of injury shall be suspended while the injured employee is at such work for which he receives wages which do not fall below 90 per cent of the wages he was receiving at the time of the accident, as limited by the provisions of section 20 hereof.

That is the provision which leaves it wholly optional to the injured employee, and if he goes to work for anybody else he may work for 90 per cent of the full wages and his compensation still continues. But the object of the provision was to operate first as an inducement to the employer to continue him at work, and then to operate as an inducement to the employee to go to work, because he would receive more if he was at work than if he was idle. I think it is an exceedingly good provision and one wholly in the interest of the employee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.
Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that if a man went to work for another and, nevertheless, drew his pay from the railroad company—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. His compensation.
Mr. REED. I ask him what he does with paragraph E of the division of section 21, which reads as follows:

(E) Where temporary partial disability results from an injury, the employee, if he is unable to secure work, shall receive 50 per cent of his wages during the continuance of such disability—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the section to which I referred.

Mr. REED (reading):

but such payment shall not extend beyond the period fixed for payment for permanent partial disabilities of the same character; and if the employee refuses to work after suitable work is furnished or secured for him by the employer, he shall not be entitled to any compensation for such disability during the continuance of such refusal. If the employee is at work at reduced wages, he shall receive compensation according to the method provided in section 22.

And following that comes section 22, which provides that if he is offered a job at 90 per cent and accepts the job, then his pay stops. Reading the two together, it seems to me there is no doubt about the proposition that if a man gets a situation from an outside party his pay stops to the extent he receives pay from the outside party; if he is offered a job at 90 per cent of his wages, then his pay stops if he takes the job voluntarily, and if he does not take it voluntarily the provisions of paragraph E come in and cut him off anyway.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understood that the Senator from Georgia was talking about permanent disability.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was combining the two. Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator was speaking about section 22 only, his statement would be correct. That applies only to temporary partial disability, where a man has received an injury which is temporary in character and is only partial. That man, of course, is able to work. So that would be only a partial disability. It is the purpose of the bill that where the man is able to work he shall work; otherwise, his compensation shall not be allowed. Under practically all the laws with which I am familiar the attempt is made to provide for a partial compensation, measured by the extent of the loss of earning ability. We have thought it was better to provide for the payment of the whole amount, the whole 50 per cent, and make it depend upon whether the man could obtain work, rather than to say to him, "Your disability is only partial; you are partly able to earn a living, and although you may not be able to get work we will measure your compensation by the extent of the loss of earning ability and not by the extent of what you lose by being unable to get work." The notion of the commission about it, after very thorough consideration, was that that provision would operate to the advantage of the man rather than an attempt to measure his loss of earning ability by a decreased amount of compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just how sections 21 and 22 will be construed together I am not prepared to say. It is expressly declared in section 21 that if the employee refuses to work after suitable work is furnished him or secured for him by an employer, he shall not be entitled to any compensation for such disability during the continuance of such refusal. It may be that the framers of this bill had in view to draw the distinc-tion between paragraph 22 and paragraph 21 and not to ex-employee was able to work and refused to work to then stop his compensation under this act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President. The language, as it seems to me, is perfectly clear. It is, where temporary partial disability results from an injury, dealing with that one class of cases, the employee, if he is unable to secure work, shall receive 50 per cent of his wages during the continuance of such disability until he is entirely recovered; that until his complete earning power has been restored he is entitled to 50 per cent, unless he can secure work. If he can secure work, being able to work, then he must do it; but so long as he can not obtain work, in that one case and in that one case only, he is to be paid 50 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is another feature of this bill to which I wish now to call attention. It provides for the reexamination and reclassification of the condition of the employee. Even if the special master allows him something and treats the disability as reasonably permanent, as a partial disability or a partial temporary disability for a certain length of time, or a permanent temporary disability for a certain length of time, the case can be reexamined undoubtedly; and if the master tendered him employment and he did not accept it, that would open up the case to show before the special master that there was something that he could do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia always speaks about the master's side of this proposition, but there is another side to it. This bill provides that at any time within two years either the employer or the employee may apply to the adjuster, and, upon showing that the disability has increased or decreased, there may be an adjustment of the compensation. That is as much to the interests of the employee, and I think more to the interests of an employee, than it is to the interests of the employer, because, take a case where the employee has sustained one of these partial disabilities—that is, it is so considered to begin with-provision is made for paying upon that basis; but within two years in the development of the injury it turns out that he has sustained permanent injury, then he goes to the adjuster, and his compensation is adjusted upon the larger basis, upon an extension of the time; so that it is quite as much and, as I think, very much more for the interest of the employee than for the interest of the em-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, again, the bill arbitrarily cuts man off from any pay for 14 days.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill furthermore provides that a man with a partially permanent disability who goes back to work and receives another injury, and the two together will produce a permanent total disability, shall not be treated as having a permanent total disability.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague a question in the hearing of the Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland]. I am asking it for information. The bill provides that where there is a total disability the employee shall receive 50 per cent of his wages for the remainder of his life. I want to ask this question: Suppose that permanent disability is one which naturally shortens that man's life, so that he receives a total disability on account of which he does not immediately die, but the natural consequence of which is that he dies within two years, is there any provision in the bill for anything to be paid?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can answer the Senator's question, and I think that is perhaps as brutal a thing as there is in the bill. The bill provides that if the employee subsequently dies from the same injury, after he has begun receiving compensation for a permanent total disability, then the beneficiaries named in the bill can recover; but from what originally would have been allowed to them if he had died at once shall be deducted both what the employee has received and what the beneficiaries would have received up to the time of the death if the employee had died immediately on receiving the injury. That is what the bill provides.

Let us examine just briefly how the beneficiaries are treated. If the employee is killed, the widow receives for a limited length of time 40 per cent of her husband's earnings. The total which she would receive on a $50-a-month allowance for an engineer making $200 a month would be $3,840; or if she has several children she would get $50 a month, or $4,800. But the limitation of the contribution to the child is fixed at 16 years of age, and on the arrival of the child at 16 the child part stops. A child 16 years of age shall draw nothing, unless dependent. tion between paragraph 22 and paragraph 21 and not to exclude him if the disability was permanent; but my own conception of their meaning was that they contemplated that if the further over in the bill, you will find that this term "dependent" is defined as applied to a child 16 years of age, and it declares that the child must be incapable of earning a living by reason of "mental or physical incapacity." So that the daughter between 13 and 18 years of age of the engineer, at the very age that she needs her father's help, at the very age that she needs his contribution to complete her education, is cut off absolutely by this bill, that is called "the workmen's compensation bill," where she is "physically or mentally deficient." unless she is "physically or mentally deficient."

Senators, among our men working on the railroads are the best paid laboring men in the country. I have seen their daughters in our high schools, in our business colleges, and in our normal schools. Most of these men spend their incomes as they make them; but, as a rule, the fathers care for their children and prepare them for life by giving them an education.

Among the best teachers we have in my State, graduates of high schools and normal schools, are the daughters of engineers, of conductors, of firemen, and of train hands of the railroads who have earned their money and educated their daughters. This bill says that at 16 years of age compensation to children stops, though the school laws all treat the children up to 18 years of age as of school age. If there be no widow and no children under 16, though there may be daughters or sons at school between 16 and 20, there is nothing allowed by this "workmen's compensation bill." For one child 25 per cent of the father's income is allowed, provided, of course, that income must never be considered as over $100 per month. It is said, however, they never go below $50. No; they do not go below $50, but they say that even the man who gets $50 shall have but half he was making, and if he is not totally disabled, he receives the $25 for only a short time, and if he is making less than $25, then he gets just what he was making.

I do not at this time desire to discuss the bill further. I hope it will go over until fall and let the railroad men in the United States themselves know what is in it. When they do, they will repudiate it. If it were not made exclusive, but cumulative, I would vote for it; but made exclusive it seems to me inexcusable on account of the character of redress to which the employee is remitted and on account of the meager compensation that is accorded to him. I say they are cut off two-thirds under this bill—more than two-thirds if they were making over a hundred dollars a month. The engineer making $200 a month, if totally disabled, ought to be entitled to his $200 for his pain and suffering and his deformity, for a total permanent disability, but he will receive only $50 a month. For partial permanent disability that really amounts, practically, to total permanent disability he will receive that sum for a few months or for two, three, or four years, and then he is left with nothing.

But it is said some reduction must be made to take care of the employee who is going to recover, but can not recover under the present law. Let us see who that is. It is the man who, on account of his own negligence, is exclusively responsible for his injury. It is also said there are cases of accident. I do not believe in accidents on railroads. Where nobody is at fault accidents do not often happen. Injuries are the result of some one doing something he ought not to do or failing to do some-and thelleve in accidents on railroads. Where nobody is at fault accidents do not often happen. Injuries are the result of some one doing something he ought not to do or failing to do something he ought not to do or failing to do something he ought to do. The safety-appliance act puts the condition of trains in a shape where, if its provisions are compiled with, the number of injured will be greatly lessened, and pure accidents will scarcely ever happen. Now, the man whose own negligence exclusively causes the accident is to be taken care of under this bill, and these enormous cuts in the compensation of everybody else are to furnish money to take care of him.

Let us take an instance A flagman turns a switch carelessly or improperly, and as a result he is killed and the engineer is killed. The engineer was absolutely free from fault. The flagman was the sole and exclusive cause of the accident. They are both killed, and their widows receive precisely the same?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, are their needs not the same?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are their rights the same?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are their rights the same?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, I reject your bill because you have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to pay the man who is entitled to nothing, but do not take it away from the man who has a legal claim. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do not object if you want to have not regarded rights. I do no with the expense, if the Senator wishes, of the negligent, though I doubt the wisdom of it. I doubt the wisdom of providing compensation to a man who is injured where his own negligence is the sole cause of the catastrophe; but, whether that be right or wrong, I protest that it is wrong to take it away from the man who was in no sense at fault and who was injured to give it to the man whose negligence was the exclusive cause of his own injury. I protest still further when under this bill so much more will be taken from the faultless man than will be given to the man who is at fault.

This bill has only recently been introduced in the Senate. was introduced on February 20 of the present year, and only reported on April 3 by the Judiciary Committee. Our present legislation and the rights to-day of the employees of railroad companies under it have just been established. The Supreme Court at the present term has for the first time passed upon the various acts of Congress and fixed the rights of the employees. Let us wait and see how that legislation works before we set it aside.

It has taken six years by successive acts of Congress passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States before railroad employees reached the place in the protection of their rights they now occupy. With the law established, construed, and settled, why wipe it out? If your object is the compensation of the men, let us allow the law to stand and let them receive the compensation a little while, at least let them try it until fall. Ah, Senators, the trouble about it is, that if you let the law ar it now has been established stand 12 months, you will have an uprising of the railroad employees all over the United States if you suggest this bill as a substitute for their rights under the existing law. Their officers who approved it would be turned out of office so fast that they would hardly have time to know the power that turned them out. What I urge is, let us wait and see what the present law is going to do. Let us hope that the railroad companies will now recognize their liabilities under the existing law and settle with their employees. If you are disturbed about fees for lawyers representing the employees, pass a bill amending the present law and limiting fees to a reasonable sum. If a workingman's compensation bill is to be passed, let us make the compensation what the men lose. The amounts named in this bill are not half enough.

I believe, Mr. President and Senators, that this bill is a serious blow at the rights now established of the large majority of the employees of railroad companies, and I am opposed to its passage in its present shape.

I ask consent of the Senate to publish at the close of my remarks the employers liability act of April 22, 1908, and also the act amendatory thereof, approved April 5, 1910.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. STONE. When on Saturday last the views of the minority of the Finance Committee on what is known as the metal-schedule bill were presented I was temporarily absent. I ask leave to attach my signature to those views.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that the Senator has that right without leave; but, without objection, the Senate will grant the Senator from Missouri the right he requests. No objection is heard.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW COAL AND ASPHALT LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for a few moments only. I ask that Senate bill 5727 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate for the purpose of discussion a bill the title of which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 5727) to provide for the appraisement of the mineral deposits of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Before I leave the floor, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill extending the time of payment by settlers in the Comanche country.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask what action was taken by the Senate upon the measure to which the Senator from Oklahoma was addressing himself?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill was simply laid before the Senate for the purpose of discussion.

Mr. OWEN. No action was asked for upon that bill. simply wanted to lay upon the record the facts with regard to the coal and asphalt lands, so that the attention of the Senate might be called to them.

Mr. President, I rise to request and to demand that the United States fulfill its treaty obligations to the Choctaw and Chickasaws by the immediate sale of the coal and asphalt deposits, as the United States is pledged to do by treaty.

Nineteen years ago the Dawes Commission was instructed to negotiate with the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the allotment of their lands, the giving up of their tribal governments, and the creation of State government (27 Stats., 645, sec. 16). The Dawes Commission was expressly authorized in this act-

To procure the cession, for such price and upon such terms as shall be agreed upon, of any lands not found necessary to be so allotted or divided, to the United States.

The Choctaws and Chickasaws were very reluctant to give up their method of landholding, and to give up their tribal governments, to which they were deeply attached. The holding of land in common was almost a religion with the Indian people. But after four years of solicitation and urging the Choctaws and Chickasaws, who had always been extremely friendly to the United States and loyal to the wishes of the Government, agreed to give up their tribal governments by an agreement of April 23, 1897 (U. S., 30 Stats., 495, sec. 29).

By this agreement the Choctaws and Chickasaws agreed to relinquish their tribal government; that their lands should be allotted; and the United States agreed on its part to fairly divide the property owned by them in common at the expense of the United States.

This agreement was amended by a supplemental agreement approved by Congress July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., 641).

By section 14 it was agreed that the residue of lands not reserved or otherwise disposed of should be sold at public auction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and the proceeds distributed per capita. And it was further expressly provided as follows:

And it was further expressly provided as follows:

Sec. 56. At the expiration of two years after the final ratification of this agreement all deposits of coal and asphalt which are in the lands within the limits of any town site established under the Atoka agreement, or the act of Congress of May 31, 1900, or this agreement, and which are within the exterior limits of any lands reserved from allotment on account of their coal or asphalt deposits, as herein provided, and which are not at the time of the final ratification of this agreement embraced in any then existing coal or asphalt lease, shall be sold at public auction for cash finder the direction of the President as hereinafter provided, and the proceeds thereof disposed of as herein provided respecting the proceeds of the sale of coal and asphalt lands.

Sec. 57. All coal and asphalt deposits which are within the limits of any town site so established, which are at the date of the final ratification of this agreement, be sold at public auction under the direction of the President as hereinafter provided, and the proceeds thereof disposed of as provided in the last preceding section. The coal or asphalt covered by each lease shall be separately sold. The purchaser shall take such coal or asphalt deposits subject to the existing lease, and shall by the purchase succeed to all the rights of the two tribes of every kind and character under the lease, but all advanced royalties received by the tribe shall be retained by them.

Sec. 58. Within six months after the final ratification of this agreement the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain, so far as may be practicable, what lands are principally valuable because of their deposits of coal or asphalt, including therein all lands which at the time of the final ratification of this agreement shall be covered by then existing coal or asphalt leases, and within that time he shall, by veritten order, segregate and reserve from allotment all of said lands. Such segregation and reservation shall conform to the su

Mr. President, it has been 10 years since this solemn promise was made to the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

They have demanded from time to time the fulfillment of this guaranty by the United States, and, as Senator from Oklahoma, I have strenuously and persistently urged the sale of these coal and asphalt lands and deposits.

The Department of the Interior, which was charged with carrying out the plighted honor of the United States, now finds shelter for not carrying out this law under the act approved April 26, 1906, section 13, which was passed at the instance and with the approval of the department itself, as follows, to

That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

These lands amount to approximately 445,000 acres:

Acres. Coal land, Choctaw Nation_____Asphalt land, Choctaw Nation_____Asphalt land, Chickasaw Nation_____ 438, 000 1, 000 6, 000

Congress has just passed an act providing for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands, but no action was taken by Congress to sell the mineral deposits of the coal and asphalt.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I am advised, desires that the United States should buy this coal and asphalt belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, with a view to the conservation of these properties and the administration of these coal fields by the Government of the United States, and he has heretofore been unwilling to carry out the pledge of the United States to sell these properties and distribute the moneys to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, because he hoped that the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States would agree to buy this property and handle it under the governmental administration.

Mr. President, I believe in the conservation of coal and asphalt, but I believe that this is a problem which primarily involves the conservation of the national honor. The preservation of the national integrity is more important than the Federal purchase or control of coal owned by private persons. The United States Government gave its pledge and its guaranty 10 years ago to nearly 30,000 human beings-the Choctaws and Chickasaws—that if they would do certain things and give up certain things, to which they were deeply attached, the United States would sell this coal and asphalt and distribute the money to these people.

The Choctaws and Chickasaws have been waiting 15 years for the fulfillment of this pledge. Nearly 5,000 of these people have died disappointed and have been denied the written pledge of this Government. Justice delayed is justice denied.

I count myself as one of the custodians of the good name of the Nation. Every Senator on this floor is charged with the personal responsibility of keeping the plighted faith of this Government, and no argument based upon material advantage will avail to justify any policy which will give ground to the Choctaws and Chickasaws to feel that the United States has been guilty of perfidy and dishonor. These Choctaws and Chick-asaws are my constituents. They are citizens of the United States and of the State of Oklahoma. They are my friends, and I represent them on this floor as Senator from the State of Oklahoma, and I serve notice on the Senate that patience has ceased to be a virtue.

I demand a fulfillment of the written pledge of this Government to the Choctaws and Chickasaws in good faith.

Nobody believes that the Government will buy this property, and nobody believes that the Government will permit this property to pass into the hands of any great monopoly. The abuse of monopoly can be prevented by selling it in tracts of reasonable size, and the laws of Oklahoma will do the rest.

If the Government is not going to buy this coal and asphalt, then let the Government immediately sell this land to the highest bidder and fulfill faithfully and honestly the plighted faith of this Nation

I wish to submit a memorandum prepared by the Department of the Interior in relation to the Choctaw and Chickasaw coal and asphalt lands as an addendum to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The memorandum is as follows:

MEMORANDUM PREPARED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR IN RELA-TION TO THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW COAL AND ASPHALT LANDS.

"Additional legislation is required before the coal lands in the Choctaw Nation can be disposed of (all of the coal lands are within the Choctaw Nation). The last act of Congress on the subject was passed April 26, 1906 (34 Stat., 137), and provides as follows:

"That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

"The last agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaws, embraced in the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. 641), provided that the coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations be segregated. This segregation took place March 24, 1903, and embraced an area of approximately 445,000 acres. This area is divided up substantially as follows:

	Acres
	438, 000
Asphaltum land, Chickasaw Nation, approximately	6,000
Aspitation land, Chicaasaw Nation, approximately	0, 000

"Of this area about 100,000 acres were covered by live coal leases in effect July 30, 1909, and the 6,000 acres of Chickasaw nation approximately 100,000 acres were covered by live coal leases in effect July 30, 1909, and the 6,000 acres of Chickasaw naphaltum lands were also covered by leases at the same time. The coal and asphaltum leases were made for a period of 30 years from their respective dates. The dates of these leases range from July 3, 1809, to September 16, 1902, and therefore they will expire by their own momentum from July 3, 1929, to September 16, 1932. Said act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat., 641). Which provided that no more mining leases should thereafter be made was not ratified by the Indians until September 25, 1902, and was not operative until ratified by the Indians. This accounts for the fact that some leases bear dates as late as September 16, 1902.

"Said act also provided that the segregated coal and asphaltum land should be sold within three years from its date at the sound asphaltum land should be sold within three years from its date at the coal lands, four assumptions may be made:

public auction for cash, under the direction of the President, by a commission composed of three persons to be appointed by the President. This commission was appointed, but no lands were disposed of by it. Pending action of said commission, Congress made a provision in the Indian appropriation act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat., 189), whereby the method of sale of the coal lands was changed from sales at public auction to sales under sealed bids. Much of the coal land was advertised for sale in 1904 under sealed bids. These sealed bids were opened at the department, but were rejected because the Secretary decided that the price offered for the coal lands was inadequate. The bids on 362 tracts, aggregating 60,946 acres (no tract exceeding 960 acres), aggregated $498,562, an average of $8.18 per acre. Such bids included not only the land itself but the mineral therein.

Nothing has been done since 1904 looking toward the sale of the coal lands, indeed nothing can be done without new legislation, as will be seen from the act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat., 137), quoted above.

"There was a wide divergence of opinion on the value of these coal lands. On account of this, Congress on June 21, 1906 (34 Stat., 325), appropriated $50,000 for the purpose of prospecting the coal lands and drilling holes at different points to ascertain the value of the coal deposits therein contained. This $50,000 was expended by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes under the personal and direct supervision of Mining Agent William Cameron. Mr. Cameron personally conducted the prospecting, drilling, and examination of the field. His prospecting has been of great value to the Government, and the $50,000 appropriated was well expended. Mr. Cameron was assisted in his work by a representative of the Geological Survey detailed by the department. The man from the Geological Survey, who has had this matter under his personal supervision, is Mr. A. W. Thompson; he, however, is not now in the Government service.

"Senate Document No. 390, Sixty-first Congress, second session, gives a full and complete report of the prospecting done in the coal areas. This report, which is evidently a reliable document, shows among other things the following, to wit:

Mr. Cameron considers the present value of the workable coal, separate from the surface, at $12,319,000 (p. 21). Cameron confines his calculation to coal veins lying 1,000 feet or less in depth from the surface (p. 90), and in the main confines his estimates to coal layers 3 feet in thickness or more (p. 90). He thinks that the segregated coal area contains 283,649 acres of good workable coal (p. 21). He estimates the total value of the coal at $12,319,000, as stated above, or at about $44 per acre (p. 71), and thinks that the rest of the segregated area, containing approximately 155,000 acres, is either barren of coal or that the coal lies too deep for any commercial value.

"The Geological Survey, to which Mr. Cameron's report was submitted, using the same basis as that adopted by Mr. Cameron, to wit, coal lying in measures 1,000 feet and less in depth and having a thickness of 3 feet or more, estimates that the workable coal covers an area of 217,382 acres (p. 90). Moreover, the Geological Survey has used another basis of calculation upon which it places the coal area at 371,689 acres, using coal measures at a depth of 3,000 feet or less and veins of a thickness as small as 14 inches.

"I especially invite your attention to the four assumptions made by the Geological Survey in valuing the coal deposits exclusive of the surface. I quote their exact language, found

DISTRICT COURT FOR WESTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I request unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5935) to fix the terms of the District Court for the Western District of Michigan. It is a bill which was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and it will cause no delay or debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "in," to strike out "June" and insert "January," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the District Court for the Western District of Michigan for the southern division shall be held at Grand Rapids, commencing on the first Tuesdays in March, June, October, and December; and for the northern division at Marquette, commencing on the second Tuesdays of April and September; and at Sault Ste. Marie. commencing on the second Tuesdays in January and July.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLAMETTE RIVER BRIDGE AT NEWBERG, OREG.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 20486) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River at or near Newberg, Oreg. It is a bill which has local reference merely.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain publications, containing valuable data upon the question of immigration, a subject which the Senate is to take up on Wednesday, as I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], and I desire it to be in the RECORD in order that Senators may have the benefit of the information contained in those publications.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. SIMMONS. The data consist of four editorials and two articles of great interest and direct relevancy to S. 3175 that is to be taken up by the Senate next Wednesday, as I have just said. The editorials are from the New York Sun, the New York Herald, the Scienific American, and the Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore. As Senators know, the Sun and Heraid are two of the leading conservative dailies of the country, the Scientific American is a highly technical and scientific periodical, and the Manufacturers Record is one of the leading trade, transportation, and financial publications of the South. The two articles are taken from recent issues of the New York Times and the Herald as indicated, and contain what seem to be very carefully prepared statements of the most recent information and expert opinion that can be obtained from State and Federal officials in a position to know minutely about conditions of which they speak.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Editorial from the Scientific American, New York City, Apr. 13, 1912.]

THE CHURCH, EUGENICS, AND IMMIGRATION.

To be a good animal is the first requisite to success in life, and to be a nation of good animals is the first condition of national prosperity.—
(Herbert Spencer.)

The announcement of a prominent cleryman that henceforth he would refuse to marry men and women eugenically unfit for wedlock has been received with an outburst of approval that shows how little Galton and his followers realized the feeling of the public on a subject which means vastly more to the preservation of society than the discussion of such questions as tarial revision and the abolition of the House of Lords. In many of the writings of eugenists the hope is expressed that some day the public will realize the meaning of heredity, and that some day legislators will take the necessary steps to prevent an increase of those elements in civilized populations which ultimately mean racial destruction. That the general public has voiced its approval of the church's position shows that eugenic ideas had been making their way far more rapidly than eugenists knew or supposed.

Almost every newspaper and every scientific periodical is publishing articles nowadays on the subject of eugenies. The terrible consequences of permitting such criminal families as the Jukes and the Zeros to saddle their countries with a thousand and more defectives in the course of a few generations must surely be realized by almost everyone who can read black print. Instances of hereditary insanity and criminality are brought to light daily in the rapidly increasing literature on eugenics. Thus, in Conklin's "Mating of the Unfit," we learn of a young man of good family who, after his discharge from the Continental Army, mated a feeble-minded girl in New Jersey. From this union came a feeble-minded daughter, whose blood can be traced in 480 descendants, of whom 143 were distinctly feeble-minded. In a paper read before the sixty-first annual session of the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania last September, Dr. Martin W. Barr, chief physician of the Pennsylvania Training School for Feeble-minded Children, cites some telling examples out of his own experience. He tells us that in Pennsylvania alone there are 10,000 cases of avowed imbecility, and of these but 3,500 are sequestrated. At present the unsequestrated feeble-minded are a distinct menace, not only to the St that of 4,050 cases of imbeclity, he found 2,051, or 65.45 per cent, caused by malign heredities, and of those 1.030, or 25.43 per cent, are due to a direct inheritance of idlocy, and 280, or 6.91 per cent, to insanity.

In a recent number the Medical Record points out that great danger lies for us in the tide of immigrants that pours into this country annually. True, our law provides for the deportation of "all idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous or persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously." But the enforcement of the law is difficult.

In a bulletin published by the New York State hospitals, it is stated that until 1905 not more than 35 immigrants were denied admission on account of insanity in any single year; but since that time, and without any especial change in the law, the number has risen to nearly 200 annually. Moreover, nearly as many defectives as insane persons have been excluded. The immigration inspectors undoubtedly do their best, but the Commissioner General of Immigration has himself pointed out how inadequate are the means at his disposal for preventing the pollution of American blood.

As might be expected, the influence of the immigrant is most clearly apparent in New York State, for here 1 out of every 250 immigrants is taken to a hospital for the insane in a year after arrival. Evidence has also been collected, chiefly by Dr. Isabelle Smart, which shows that no less than 30 per cart of the feeble-minded in our population may be traced to bad alien blood.

We take elaborate pains that diseased cattle shall not be allowed to affect the public health from the far greater danger that lurks in bad human blood. Some day a patriotism will be inculcated, based upon a noble culture of racial purity, a patriotism that will recognize the truth of Lord Beaconsfield's dictum: "The public health is the foundation on which reposes the happinness of the people and the power of [Editorial from Manufacturers Record, Baltimore, Md., Apr. 11, 1912.] SCATTERING IMMIGRANTS.

Expectation on the part of its promoters that Southern States will cooperate with the "Southern Settlement and Development Organization," recently devised by way of Baltimore, and the formation in New York of the American Immigration Distribution League, calling upon the Federal Government to establish a land fund for the purpose of making loans to immigrant farmers, point to the imperative necessity for additional restrictions upon immigration and rigid enforcement of them, regardless of local or national political exigencies, until there shall be no longer inducements for the movement to this country of the classes now dominant in immigration.

There is a leaven of good intent and humanitarianism in most of the movements that have come to the surface in the past 10 or 15 years looking either to relieving eastern cities of the congestion of undersirable populations from abroad or to making it easier for greater herds of such elements to enter this country. Recognition of that fact, however, should not blind the intelligence of the country to the real inspiration of such movements, either of a most material character having to do with increasing the earning of trans-Atlantic steamship companies or centered in foreign-born racial or ecclesiastical schemes hoping to use this country as a pawn. There have been so many mistakes in this connection within the past decade, so many specious schemes, that it is difficult to understand how southern men can still hope for good results from any immigration movement in which individual States shall participate on any basis save that of individual State bureaus controlled by the people of the State, whose taxes support them. The movement for scattering immigrants that would be a benefit to the country would be one that would scatter 80 per cent of the number now specking admission to the country back to the European lands that have speeded them to the United States.

[Editorial from the New York (Evening) Sun, Mar. 28, 1912.] A COMING ISSUE.

In more ways than one the present and the near future seem likely to offer years of unusual test for the Republic in which we live. A desire to experiment with the iridescent toy of pure democracy has already disturbed the workings of representative government in various parts of the country. And impatience with courts and constitutions may well cause graver confusion. The actual evil from such experiments may not be great, and every try at pure democracy contains a fresh demonstration of the futility of such reversion to primitive methods in a modern State. Nor have we any patience with those gloomy dyspepties who consider that American polltical sense has gone to the dogs. It hasn't—and it is a pleasure to observe it attacking the new problems at once with zest and patience.

But America is one thing, and America overlaid or interlarded with large slices of the most ignorant and unreliable portions of Europe is another. And the indeterminate factor in the coming years—the coming issue—is the question of how much further we can permit free, unsifted immigration. Our current immigration both raises the most serious problems now ferming for governmental solution, and also, by lowering the intelligence of the electorate, furnishes the gravest hiadrance to their solution. The sudden cruption of the gaunt fagure of syndicalism in our labor troubles is the most omnious sign of the times. We have had our strikes a-plenty in the past, but the first considerable development of an actually revolutionary spirit comes to-day, and comes, as lately at Lawrence and now at Paterson, among the un-American immigrants from southern Europe.

The question is not one to be settled in a day or in a year. We shall doubtless have it with us for a long while to come. But we think the time is ripe for a very serious debate upon the problem, and actually for a beginning of restrictive measures. The first brute need for hands to lay open an unexplored continent has unquestionably passed. Such need as remains must be balanced against the paramount need for minds to govern a highly developed nation.

Fortunately, the whole subject has been most thoroughly examined in recent years, and the facts are before the Nation. The recent congressional investigation resulted in a pientiful array of statistics, and especially in a single volume, The Immigration Problem, prepared by Prof. Jenks and Prof. Lauck, who aided in the study. Much of their interesting report was stated to the Senate recently by Senator Stramons, of North Carolina. The question is before that body in connection with a amendment by the Senator from North Carolina. To quote the conclusion of his argument:

"In nearly every State we are expending annually enormous sums of money to educate the boys and the girls who are to be the citizens of the future, who are to control the destiny of this country and its institutions. In many States there are compulsory-atendance laws. The taxpayers are assuming this great financial burden; they are insisting upon this higher degree of education for our boys and girls, because they appreciate and thoroughly understand the fact that in an enlightened democracy such as ours, a country where we have sovereignty citizenship, the safety of our institutions, nay, the perpetuity of those institutions, depends upon the measure of intelligence of its people.

eignty citizenship, the safety of our institutions, nay, the perpetuity of those institutions, depends upon the measure of intelligence of its people.

"Here, sir, we are spending annually upon our boys hundreds of millions of dollars to fit them for citizenship, because we know that that better fits them for participation in a government like ours. Yet, Mr. President, in the face of this fact, in the face of this large expenditure of money for this purpose, when the Nation as a whole comes to act we open the doors and admit every year to our citizenship between 200,000 and 300,000 of as densely ignorant and ifficente peoples as live under God's sun. Why should we do this? Is it not a contradiction in policy? Is it not inconsistent with our whole educational history, especially of the last 25 or 30 years?"

The facts which he quoted to support his view are familiar enough. The change in the character of immigration in the last 25 years is notorious. Of the total immigration prior to 1883, 95 per cent came from England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, The Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland. From 1883 to 1907, 81 per cent came from Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Poland, Fortugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Spain, Syria, and Turkey. This latter stream is one-half illiterate; more than a third does not setile here, but returns to its source, and the rest largely lives to itself and resists assimilation. All of which facts are admirably illustrated, for example, in the racial condition existing in Lawrence, Mass.

Whether the literacy test is a sound method of restriction is a moot question. Nine out of the ten members of the congressional investigating committee agreed upon it as the best practical means, though frankly admitting its shortcomings. Possibly such a test if supplemented by other restrictions might meet the needs of the situation. But the point we would make is that the time has come when some restrictive plan must be devised and applied. The

NEW YORK HAS SPENT $25,000,000 ON ALIEN INSANE—INSUFFICIENT GOVERNMENT INSPECTION AT ELLIS ISLAND IS ADMITTING LARGE NUMBERS EACH YEAR THAT SHOULD BE DEPORTED, AND IS SADDLING A HEAVY BURDEN ON THE STATE.

In some years New York State has spent as much as one-third of its entire revenue in the care of its insane. This year it will probably spend—at least the lunacy commission has asked for—$9,006,000, or one-fifth of its income, in this way.

Startling as these figures are, there are others even more surprising. Of the inmates of the State hospitals for the insane about one-half are foreign born. The logical inference is that a large number of lunatics or potential lunatics are successful in passing the examination at Ellis Leland.

Island.

The authority for these figures is Mr. Goodwin Brown, who has for many years been deeply interested in the question of insanity.

Mr. Brown was one of the State commissioners in lunacy during the years 1895-96. These were the years in which the State completed its work of taking over from the local authorities the management of institutions for the insane. Up to this time the various townships and cities had cared for their defectives, and the expense was spread out over a large territory and among many different boards. When consolidation took place, however, it became possible to see just how enormous were the sums spent on hospitals for the insane, and those who were interested in the subject felt the need of further legislation.

Mr. Brown has in the past worked to secure legislation from Congress in regard to the alien insane, and has also appeared before the United States Industrial Commission, speaking on the same subject. The State commission in lunacy employed him in 1902 to appear before Congress and present the situation as it existed in New York, and in 1903 some legislation was secured. The time in which it is possible to deport an aften who is found insane in this country was lengthened, and several safeguards were employed to lessen the danger of admitting

UNABLE TO COPE WITH BUSH OF ALIENS, BIGGEST ON RECORD—PERIL TO COUNTRY—HEALTH OF CITY AND NATION MENACED, IT IS ASSERTED, BY LAX INSPECTION—THOUSANDS UNFIT PERMITTED TO ENTER—AUTHORITIES DECLARE FACILITIES AT ELLIS ISLAND ARE INADEQUATE FOR HANDLING GREAT HORDE—MORE BUILDINGS NEEDED—CAN NOT PROVIDE QUARTERS FOR PERSONS WHO SHOULD BE DETAINED PENDING AN INVESTIGATION.

Decause of the inadequate facilities for the examination and care of the immigration which is now pouring into this country, and which was reported at its highest tide in the history of the port yesterday, thousands of aliens, diseased both mentally and physically, are permitted to enter and spread their evil influence widely. At Ellis Island, where the immigrants are examined, it is impossible properly to examine the large number of immigrants now, and as a result a gross injury is inflicted upon the health of this country.

For the most part the immigrants come from the unhealthy parts of southern Europe and carry contagious diseases. Many are weak-minded, a condition difficult to detect, especially in children, and they are sent here by their relatives abroad because they can receive better care in American institutions. A majority of the immigrants get no further than this city, and prominent medical authorities here have often declared that the foreigners are responsible for much of the disease in the tenement quarters.

William Williams, Commissioner of Immigration, stationed at Ellis Island, said yesterday in an interview to the Herald that improvements were sadly needed. He said it was impossible to care for the flood of immigrants during this season, and that of necessity many aliens were passed who should be held for detention.

CONDITIONS IN A BAD WAY.

CONDITIONS IN A BAD WAY.

"I do not want to be an alarmist," he said, "but conditions here are in a bad way. We need additional buildings and additional facilities for handling the increased immigration. As it is, we must rush through with them, and this is hardly fair to the country. There are many cases which should be held until a second and complete examination could be made, but we have not the accommodations for them here. It is a serious question, and Congress should take cognizance of its importance and make ample provisions.

"We have many cases in the spring months, when immigration is heavy, that we can handle only with reasonable care. It would require an expenditure of more than a million dollars for the erection of buildings to properly examine and care for the aliens. I will not say that we are obliged to make a superficial examination of immigrants, but we examine them under present conditions only with reasonable care."

The immigration this month has passed the high-water mark. In April of last year, which was a big month and which tested the capacity of the department, 83,575 immigrants arrived at Ellis Island. In April this year the total is expected to be more than 100,000 immigrants, which will be the record for the department.

To date for this month 6,000 more immigrants have arrived than in the same period of April last year. In March of this year, despite the uncertainty of labor, 83,654 immigrants arrived, as against 75,306 of last year, which was one of the biggest years of immigration in the history of the department.

HEALTH OF COUNTRY MENACED.

HEALTH OF COUNTRY MENACED.

HEALTH OF COUNTRY MENACED.

By those in authority it is said that Ellis Island, as it is conducted at this time, is wholly inadequate, and as a result the health of the country, and especially of this city, is menaced. Recently the Herald published statistics showing that more than 60 per cent of the occupants of charitable institutions and insane asylums in New York were foreign born and likely entered here under the lax system of the immigration authorities. An official at Ellis Island yesterday said:

"The immigrants coming to this country, especially from the south of Europe, are not the dull, ignorant people they are commonly supposed to be. They are smart and, for the most part, clever in their attempts to dupe the immigration officials. There is so much faking among them that it is often difficult to arrive at the truth.

"We have found that many aged men and women who come here ostensibly to join their sons and daughters come for no other reason than to enter some American charitable institution for the remainder of their lives. They have no children here, but through agents get other persons to pose as their children until they pass the authorities. We naturally pass them on, as we have no means to detain them until a proper investigation is made."

The same condition is said to exist in the examination of persons for tuberculosis and like diseases. Also it has been found impossible to properly examine children who are believed to be slightly demented. One official said yesterday that many weak-minded children are passed by the authorities in the rush months of immigration because they have no time to make a complete examination.

CAN CARE FOR 1,800 AT NIGHT.

CAN CARE FOR 1,800 AT NIGHT.

Commissioner Williams said yesterday that they can care for only 1,800 persons at night at Ellis Island. When almost twice that number arrives, as is the case this month, the authorities are obliged to rush them through. Allens who naturally would be detained until a complete examination could be made are permitted to enter this city. Commissioner Williams blames the state of affairs upon Congress for refusing to make appropriations for suitable quarters and facilities to maintain an efficient standard of inspection.

"We are up against it here," said Commissioner Williams, "but the strictest sort of an investigation will prove that we are doing the very best we can in the circumstances. We handle every immigrant with reasonable care, but when they pour in on us as they have in the last few weeks, of course the physicians have to hurry through with their inspection.

few weeks, of course the physicians have to hurry through with their inspection.

"No one is more interested than I in making a thorough examination of immigrants. But what are we going to do? Already we have had complaints about putting the allens in three-tier cots, the only manner in which we are able to care for 1,800 each night. Last year 749,642 allens arrived at this port, and of that number 14,500 were deported for various reasons. The steamship agents abroad are responsible in a large measure for accepting as passengers persons who are totally unfit to land here.

WOULD INCREASE THE FINE.

"In 1911 the steamship companies were fined $14,000 for bringing in passengers mentally affected or with contagious diseases. I would favor increasing the fine from $100 to $200 as one means of preventing the rush of foreign imbeciles and unhealthy subjects. It means increased taxation to care for this great number of mentally and physically incapacitated persons. I understand that New York pays more than $8,000,000 annually to care for the indigent insane, and of this number at least two-thirds are foreign born. These figures show the advisability of Congress spending one-eighth of that amount for adequate facilities to make proper examination of aliens coming to this port.

quate facilities to make proper examination of aliens coming to this port.

"Our hospital department is totally inadequate for a proper execution of the law relating to the detention of the physically and mentally defective. We are doing the best we can in the circumstances, but it is a serious proposition and means a great deal in the future health of this country.

"We are sadly handicapped in not having sufficient quarters for the immigrants detained pending investigation. And the quarters we have are poorly ventilated and must be used both night and day. Our dormitories are in bad condition, and the responsibility for the continuance of these conditions must rest with Congress.

"The complaint that there are many feeble-minded alien children in the public schools of New York, who have passed Ellis Island, is due to the lack of time and facilities for a thorough examination as to mental condition. It is true that this element of feeble-minded persons forms a large part of the immates of the Elmira Reformatory and contributes largely to the criminal class. But we make every effort to exclude them. Greater effort should be exercised, I know, to prevent the landing of feeble-minded immigrants. But we can not do that without additional facilities. It is a physical impossibility."

CAUSE FOR ALARM.

That there is cause for alarm from the big influx of immigration now flowing into this country without proper inspection is admitted by everyone familiar with the circumstances. From the plague-ridden districts of eastern and southern Europe thousands of immigrants are coming here every week. There is no question that many of them are suffering with diseases characteristic of their country and not a few are in the early stages of consumption.

One steamship agent who canvasses abroad for passengers declared that he had found that young allens come to this country for their health. They are made familiar with the examination to which they will be subjected upon their arrival here and fortify themselves for the ordeal,

They also are acquainted with the fact that in March and April an unusually large number of immigrants come to the United States and that the examination at that time must necessarily be conducted in a lax manner. Consequently those who are mentally or physically deficient take advantage of the rush season to enter this country. Once here, they are willing to enter a charitable institution, where they will receive better care than at home.

[Editorial from New York Herald, Apr. 13, 1912.] TROUBLE AHEAD.

TROUBLE AHEAD.

We call attention in the news columns this morning to the flood of immigrants now pouring into the country through the port of New York. They are coming in larger numbers than ever before. In March 83,654, a record number for that month, passed inspection. So far in April 6,000 more have entered than for the first half of April last year. Some 3,000 a day, often more, have to be examined by the immigration inspectors. Almost needless to say, it is impossible to determine properly in the time that can be given each of them the fitness of any such number for entrance. At the very most 1,800 can be cared for with the quarters and the staff at the command of the Commissioner of Immigration.

Hence a large number of most undesirable persons are being necessarily admitted. We pointed out in the Herald months ago, with the warning that immigration would probably be higher than ever this year, that at the present time nearly two-thirds of the inmates of the public insane asylums of the metropolitan district are of foreign birth. The ratio will be even higher after this. Insanity is only one of the undesirable qualities in such a heterogeneous mass. It may be fairly taken as an index of what can be confidently expected from our short-sighted policy.

This must stop. We need better immigration laws, but above all we need at once more inspectors to enforce our existing laws properly. We are laying up physical, mental, and moral trouble for our people. Who is to blame?

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the routine business, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill

Mr. BACON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Utah what is the bill with respect to which he has given notice?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is the compensation bill.

Mr. BACON. I want to say that my colleague, who is very much interested in that measure, will be necessarily absent from the Senate for two days, and I hope it will not be taken up in his absence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that there will be no vote taken upon it, but I want to proceed with its consideration. I desire myself to submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. BACON. Of course I would not interpose any objection to the Senator's being heard at any time he wishes, but from what the Senator heard my colleague say this afternoon-he has left the Senate Chamber for the purpose of making an address, and that is the reason I am making this representation in his behalf-it is obvious that he desires to take part in the discussion which will ensue, and that he not simply desires to be here when the vote is taken. While, of course, I certainly would not make any objection to the Senator's giving notice of his intention to speak, I do think, under the circumstances, that the notice that he proposes to call up the bill for consideration could, without any great injury to the public service, be postponed for two days.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I gave notice more than a week ago that I would ask to have the bill considered last Monday, a week ago to-day, and at the request of Senators I have postponed it from day to day, and I am afraid that unless we take the third time, and passed.

it up pretty soon we are not going to reach a vote upon it at this session.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not anticipating, certainly, an adjournment of Congress in the very near future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but I think we had better make some headway with it.

Mr. BACON. I do not object at all to the notice the Senator has given of his desire to speak, but I hope the bill will not be taken up regularly to-morrow.

Sec. 3. That the Joint resolution approved February 5, 1905, also the joint resolution approved March 2, 1909, and all other laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this resolution are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if this is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is, and the joint resolution is also indersed by the department.

NAVY MEMORIAL IN VICKSBURG NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5991) to authorize the War Department to use the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made by Congress for the construction of a Navy memorial in the Vicksburg National Military Park, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I object. The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator from Massachusetts misunderstands the bill. He perhaps thinks it is the bill which was up before, to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] objected. This is a bill to appropriate an unexpended balance of five thousand and some hundred dollars to complete a Federal naval monument in the Vicksburg National Military Park a totally different bill. The money has already been appropriated, and now the War Department has asked, and the Vicksburg National Park Commission has asked, that this amount hitherto unexpended be used to put some ornaments around the pedestal.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the objection. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consid-

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to strike out the preamble. I do not think it is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question will come after the bill is disposed of. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, which will be stated.

The Secretary. In section 3, page 2, line 10, after the words "Memorial Association," strike out the words "shall have the power" and insert the words "is authorized," so as to read:

That the George Washington Memorial Association is authorized to erect said building in accordance with plans to be prepared under the supervision of the Commission of Fine Arts, said building to be fire-proof, faced with granite, and to cost not less than $2,000,000; it shall have an auditorium that will seat not less than 6,000 people, and such other smaller halls, reception rooms, office rooms, etc., as may be deemed necessary to carry out the purposes for which the building is erected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert the words "to be administered by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution," so as

And the said George Washington Memorial Association shall in addition provide a permanent endowment fund of not less than $500,000, to be administered by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, the income from which shall, as far as necessary, be used for the maintenance of the said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 3, line 19, after the word "hereby," to strike out "appropriated" and insert 'set apart"; and in line 19, page 3, before the word "purpose," to strike out "the" and insert "that," so as to make the section

SEC. 4. That in order to carry into effect this act permission is granted the George Washington Meniorial Association to erect said building in the north end of the reservation known as Armory Square, bounded by Sixth and Seventh Streets west and B Street north and B street south. The south front of said building is to be on a line with the south front of the new National Museum Building, in the north end of the Smithsonian Park; and the said land is hereby set apart for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 3, line 20, after the word "may," to insert "among other purposes," so as to make the section read.

Sec. 5. That said building may, among other purposes, be used for inaugural receptions and special public meetings authorized by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 3, line 24, after the word "this," to strike out "title, but no contract or individual right made or acquired under such provisions shall be thereby divested or impaired" and insert "act," so as to make the section read:

Sec. 6. That Congress may alter, amend, add to, or repeal any of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engressed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I now move to strike out the preamble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the preamble is stricken out.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that the preamble does any harm. It is largely a recitation of historical facts, and this is in time intended to be largely a historical building. I know that the authors of it, who are composed of good women, are somewhat attached to the recitation. I hope the Senator will allow it to stand. Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the preamble has been read and read into the RECORD. It is not customary to put in a bill a preamble of the character of a stump speech. good speech of a historical nature, but I do not think it should be allowed to stand as a precedent. I think we had better stick to the usual form of bills. I do not see why we should make an exception in this case. I am in favor of the bill, and I shall vote for it, but I think we ought not to violate the precedent.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the suggestion that preambles are generally objectionable, but I think this memorial building will be a somewhat notable exhibition. I do not wish to make any issue on it, but I am satisfied that the ladies who are promoting this very laudable enterprise would be gratified to have the recitation remain in the bill, and it is for their gratification that I desire to have the preamble stand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to strike out the preamble.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Georgia in expressing the hope that the Senator from North Carolina will not lay violent hands on this preamble. Nobody is going to be hurt by it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nobody is going to be hurt by it, and if it is going to provoke debate I will not insist on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the motion, and the preamble is agreed to.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6011) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Connecticut.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following

Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this bill, the State of Connecticut, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

So as to make the bill read:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator who reported the bill adversely, it seems to me we hardly ought to put it through by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object?

Mr. LODGE. T object

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

HOMESTEADS UPON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patents to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attree of the bill stated first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary was about to read the bill. It may be that the Senator from Idaho can explain it in less time.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nevada has just spoken to me; and if he does not want to go ahead at this time I should at least like to have the bill read and the committee amend-ments adopted. Then I will not urge the bill, if the Senator from Nevada is not ready to proceed with it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, with amendments, in section 2, page 2, line 1, after the word "patent," to strike out "together page 2, line 1, after the word "patent," to strike out "together with the water right appurtenant to or belonging to the land covered by such patent"; in line 4, after the word "patented," to strike out "for which a water right is certified" and insert "together with all water rights appurtenant or belonging thereto"; in line 10, after the words "United States," to insert "or its successors in the control of the project"; and to add a new section at the end of the bill to be known as section 3, as follows: follows:

MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOODS (H. DOC. NO. 088)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith communication from the Secretary of War, in which he sets out the necessity for an additional appropriation to meet the expenses which have been incurred and are likely to be incurred by the War Department in meeting the emergency of the present floods upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The estimates include an estimate of $300,000 from the Chief of Engineers, in addition to the $350,000 already appropriated, to be used for the same purpose as the original appropriation in protecting levees against impending floods. It applies to the tributaries of the Mississippi as well as the main river, but does not include any estimate for damages already caused in districts where the crest of the flood has passed.

The Quartermaster General estimates that an expenditure of $275,000 will be required to cover the expenses which he is incurring, and will be obliged to incur, in furnishing shelter, forage for cattle and horses, transportation, etc.

The Commissary General estimates that he will require the sum of $212,879.11 to cover the expense of the rations which he is supplying, and will be obliged to supply, to the thousands of destitute persons in the flood regions.

of destitute persons in the flood regions.

The crest of the flood is now reaching the lower portion of the Mississippi where the country is flatter, and where the danger to the levees is at least as great as above, and where the damage and loss to persons and property, if crevasses occur, will be far greater than on the upper river, necessitating even a greater amount of relief work than that already incurred.

These estimates have been carefully made, and are based on communications from officers of the Army now upon the ground superintending the relief and engineering work superintending the relief and engineering work.

I respectfully urge upon Congress the importance of meeting this great emergency. The estimates, copies of which are transmitted herewith, have been sent regularly to the Secretary of the Treasury to be submitted in Congress.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous Consent Calendar day and suspension day. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

CLAIMS ARISING FROM INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14667) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, that bill is the special order for Wednesday next.
Mr. MANN. Then it might as well go off this calendar, I suppose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am willing to have it dropped from this calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will strike it from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and report the next bill.

CERTAIN LANDS, UVALDE, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22301) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Uvalde, Tex., a certain strip of land.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to convey, by quitclaim deed, to the city of Uvalde, Tex., for street purposes, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to a strip of land off the west and south sides of the Federal building site in said city of sufficient width to provide a 10-foot sidewalk: Provided, That the city of Uvalde, Tex., shall construct and maintain said sidewalks the same as other sidewalks in said city are improved and maintained.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire about the proviso at the end of this bill. Does it commit the Government to building sidewalks, the same as citizens of Uvalde, Tex.?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will read the provision he will conclude, I am sure, that it provides for just the reverse.

I do not know what the ordinances of the Mr. FOSTER.

city provide, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. GARNER. I do not know what the ordinances are, but the intention is to transfer from the Government of the United States a strip of land that was inadvertently condemned to the city for sidewalk purposes that the city may maintain the expense of keeping up the sidewalks instead of the Federal Government doing it, and to give the city jurisdiction from a police standpoint. I may say while I am on my feet that this bill was introduced at the suggestion of the Treasury Department. I have no more interest in it than any other Member of the House, except that it is the policy of the Treasury Department to have the local municipalities control the streets and sidewalks surrounding public buildings.

The city is to build the sidewalks and main-Mr. FOSTER.

tain them.

Mr. GARNER. It is hoped that they will keep all the sidewalks in repair and maintain them. Whether they will do it I am not able to guarantee.

Mr. MANN. At any rate, the Government will not be required to keep them up.

Mr. FOSTER. I wondered if the language was such that it would not require the Government to maintain them. It says "the same as other sidewalks in the city are improved and

Mr. MANN. I will say that the city under the law would not have authority to make an assessment against the Government and collect it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that, but this language might be so construed that we were acknowledging our liability to build and maintain the sidewalks.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that it is open to that construction, but even if it were they could not levy an assessment against the Government property and collect it.

Mr. FOSTER. No; but their Representative could present a bill to the Committee on Claims and have it reported to this House.

Mr. MANN. He might present it. I doubt whether he could get it reported, and I am quite sure that he could not get it passed. Mr. FOSTER. I do not know about that. The gentleman from Texas generally gets reported what he wants in this

Mr. MANN. Yes; the gentleman from Texas is very efficient

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois on my right [Mr. Mann], but the State of Texas seldom ever asks for anything unless it is proper, and therefore Congress is always willing to grant it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CORSICANA, TEX.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

'A bill (H. R. 12013) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Corsicana, Tex., certain lands for alley purposes. The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to convey, by quitclaim deed, to the city of Corsicana, Tex., for the purpose of a public alley, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to a strip of land off the rear of the Federal building site in said city of sufficient width to provide, in connection with land adjacent thereto, a 10-foot alley: Provided, That the city of Corsicana shall open said alley and improve and maintain the same as other public alleys of said city are improved and maintained.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS IN NEBRASKA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20498) for the relief of certain homesteaders in Nebraska.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted; etc., That all additional or second homestead entries heretofore permitted to be made under the act entitled "An act to amend the homestead laws as to certain unappropriated and unreserved public lands in Nebraska," approved April 28, 1904, by entry-men who were possessed at the time of such entry of more than 160 acres of land, independently of the former entry, but qualified in other respects, are hereby validated in cases where cancellations shall not have been made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman as to what is the object of the first committee amendment, which would make it read, "That all such additional or second homestead entries," there having been no prior mention of any homestead entry?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The bill as introduced provided "that all additional or second homestead entries which have heretofore been permitted erroneously to be made under the act," and so forth, and the committee proposes an amendment to provide that all "such additional or second homestead entries," and so forth. Now to what does the word "such" refer? Is there any reason for inserting it there, as this is the first reference to additional or second homestead entries?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, all such as were erroneously permitted to be entered. Some were legally entered, some of the entries are legal under one section of this act, while others that do not come precisely under that particular section are not legal under another section under which they more naturally fall.

They were held in the first place to be legal under that section, and entries were permitted under that section which were allowed to be held for a number of years-some of them for six years, some of them for almost seven years, meanwhile the law being complied with. The word "such" is for the purpose of preventing the implication that all of the entries were illegal while some were legal. Those permitted under section 2 of the act were legal, while those permitted under section 3 of the act were held illegal.

Those committee amendments were made upon my own suggestion, I having introduced the bill, so as to not permit the implication that these entries which were held by the department to be legal were illegal.

Mr. MANN. Then ought it not to read:

That all such additional or second homestead entries as have been heretofore permitted—

And so forth, instead of-

That all such additional or homestead entries which have heretofore been permitted—

And so forth?

Let me ask the gentleman further: This bill would not grant relief, as I understand it, if a man had purchased a piece of property, a farm, and had not entered it under the homestead law, and then desired to acquire additional ground under the homestead law?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It covers just such cases as that. In one draft of the bill I had it worded "whether acquired by purchase or otherwise," but I preferred this draft finally, and this was acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. MANN. Have all of these lands been entered as homesteads? Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Oh, yes; it is for homestead entries and nothing else that the relief is sought.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man has since acquired by purchase one of these homestead entries which he has not entered under the homestead law? In that case he could not receive any benefit under this act?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I do not think I understand the gentleman—acquired by purchase a homestead entry?

Mr. MANN. Yes; from the original entryman.
Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. To explain to the gentleman, the difficulty arises by reason of the fact that the bill originally was intended to allow persons who had made one quarter section entries in this territory covered by the one-section act, subsequently passed, to make additional three quarter section entries so as to make them even with the newcomer, the new entryman, who was authorized to enter a whole section. In the case of many of these entrymen who made the first entry of one quarter section they thereafter acquired some lands by purchase and thereby became possessed of more than 160 acres.

It is held by the department that under the third section of the act they were disqualified from making additional entry for that reason, namely, that they had acquired other lands by purchase, so that they had more than 160 acres of land. This is to relieve those who had acquired by purchase more than the 160 acres.

I will state for the benefit of the House that the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, having a case under consideration where this very question was involved, withheld his decision, which must have been adverse to the entry, until such legisla-tion as this could be passed. The entry was made six years ago, and the entryman had lived upon the land, complied with the law, fulfilled all the requirements, and made valuable improvements. The facts appealed to the Secretary so strongly for equitable relief that he suspended making a decision and voluntarily recommended this very legislation. However, I had introduced bills in previous Congresses providing for the same relief, and I had a bill already drafted to introduce when the Secretary made the recommendation. The pending bill is for the relief of such cases as the Secretary had and yet has under consideration and other cases like it. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

LEASE OF SCHOOL LANDS FOR PUBLIC-PARK PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2577) authorizing the lease of school lands for public-park purposes in the State of Washington for a longer period than five years.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk fend as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the southeast quarter and the southwest quarter, section 36, township 18 north, range 10 west; and the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 16, township 17 north, range 0 west, in Chehalis County, granted to the State of Washington for educational purposes, may, under such rules and regulations as the legislature of the said State shall prescribe, be leased for public-park purposes for such term as said legislature may fix, anything in the enabling act of said State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand from this bill that it is proposed to permit the State to use for other purposes land which the Government denated to the State for school purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, no, sir; I do not think it is.

Mr. MANN. Well, what is the purpose, then?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Government originally granted to the State of Washington this land for school purposes. In the enabling act by which that State came into the Union there was a provision that the school lands should never be leased by the State for a longer period than five years. Now the State wants to lease to two cities these two tracts of land for parks and playground purposes for the children and the public. The cities or the school districts can not afford to expend a large amount of money improving parks on a five-year lease. The legislature has already passed an act granting these parks for these school or playground purposes, and the court held that the act was unconstitutional, because of that restriction in the enabling act; and the attorney general of that State has rendered an opinion that the State legislature can not grant these small tracts of land for use for park purposes for longer than five years, because of that restriction or limitation in the enabling act. Now, this bill is to have Congress waive its right, if it has any, to object or protest against the State modifying or ignoring the provisions of its enabling act in regard to these That is all there is to it. two parks.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman and I have stated the case at all differently. The gentleman states now that land which we donated to the State for school purposes the State desires to have used for public-park purposes. That is quite a different thing from school purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think a public park that is used by school children as a playground is not only perfectly legitimate, but necessary for the welfare of the children and the community

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether it is used for a playground or not. It does not state that in the report; the purpose stated in the report is to permit the State to lease, I suppose, at a nominal rental these school lands for public-park purposes. I question whether that ought to be done.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I prepared that report for the committee, and I thought it was very full and plain. Does not the gentleman feel that the Legislature of the State of Washington can be trusted to lease for park purposes these tracts of land, when all the State officials and all the organizations practically in that part of the State have memorialized Congress, urging the passage of this bill? There is absolutely no opposition to it in that State or anywhere else.

Mr. MANN. That may all true; but we granted the land for the use of schools to help provide education. Now, if the State desires to divert the land to some other purpose I question whether it is a policy which we ought to permit. What excuse is there for taking school lands and using them for public-park purposes

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, the State already has the right to lease the land for five years for this purpose, and this act simply gives them the right to lease it for longer than five years. Congress is not giving away anything, and that State is not squandering anything.

Mr. MANN. They may have the right to lease school lands for park purposes at a nominal rental, but I question whether they have the moral right to take lands which the Government donated them for school purposes and divert them to publicpark purposes without compensation.

Mr. WARBURTON. May I interrupt the gentleman? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. WARBURTON. I would like to say a word in addition to what the gentleman has said. We have in the State of Washington full power to sell our school lands. If the State wanted to cheat the school fund out of its money it could sell them for practically a nominal sum and give a deed. Now, that is not the situation. The school land in question is within the city limits of Aberdeen, a town of about 15,000 people, and a very rapidly growing city. The State of Washington does not proose to sell that school land for 10 or 15 years, possibly longer. They want to hold it as one of the great assets belonging to the school fund. It is within the city of Aberdeen covered with heavy undergrowth and trees, an unsightly piece of land.

The city of Aberdeen wants to build streets and alleys, walks and drives, through that land and clear up the underbrush on it. It can not afford to go to that expense on a five-year lease. State wanting to preserve its splendid assets in school lands will not sell it, but is willing to lease it for 5, 10, or 15 years, according to what the people of the State or the legislature ultimately conclude, but it is going to be an enormous asset for the school funds in time. We are preserving it, and we are objecting to selling it until we can sell it for a great big sum for the benefit of the schools of the State. If we had wanted to give that to the people of Aberdeen and realize the last penny to be made out of it, we could have sold it to them for a nominal consideration. But the State does not want to do that. It wants to give the people of Aberdeen the privilege of building walks and driveways through this land, and hold it and sell it for a great big sum to the people of our State for the benefit of our schools.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARBURTON. Gladly; yes. Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe if they divert this school land for park purposes it will ever be used for any other purpose than as a park? Will the people there have any desire to have it sold for school purposes?

Mr. WARBURTON. There is not any question about it. we want to make it as a gift we have the power to do it this We do not ask Congress to make that gift to Aberdeen at all, and we are not going to do it, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. We are going to save that school land as we saved the land for our State university. They tried to buy that, but they leased it for 30 years, and they have sixstory buildings on it. It comes back to us in 30 years. We are not going to dissipate our school lands as they did in Illinois. You touch our people on the question of school lands and you touch a tender spot. We do not sell them until we get a good price.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman's prophecy is true.

Mr. WARBURTON. It is correct.

Mr. MANN. I will make the prophecy if this becomes a law it will remain a park always, and the school will lose the benefit of it.

Mr. WARBURTON. I want to make a prophecy. I venture the assertion that the people of the State of Washington will get $1,000,000 for their school fund if you let them alone and let them take care of their own business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REPORTS OF STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22343) to require supervising inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, to submit their annual report at the end of each fiscal year.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4410, Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 4410. Each supervising inspector shall report, in writing, at the end of each fiscal year to the Supervising Inspector General the general business transacted in his district during the year, embracing all violations of the laws regulating vessels, and the action taken in relation to the same; all investigations and decisions by local inspectors; and all cases of appeal and the result thereof. The board shall examine into all the acts of each supervising inspector and local board, and all complaints made against same, in relation to the performance of their duties under the law, and the judgment of the board in each case shall be entered upon their journal; and the board shall, as far as possible, correct mistakes where they exist."

Sec. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of July, 1912.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Alex-ANDER] if it is desired to have this law take effect so as to require reports for this fiscal year?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. I notice the bill does not provide that the law take effect until the 1st of July, which would not require reports for this fiscal year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know whether it was an inad-vertence of the department in drawing the bill or not.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be well enough to amend it so as to make the reports for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But with the bill as it now stands, making the law take effect the 1st day of July, there will be no provision in the law whatever for a report between the 1st of January and the 30th of June, because they will not be authorized under this bill to make a report for this fiscal year under the present law. Under the present law they are only authorized to make reports for the calendar year. That provision is repealed, and this law does not take effect until after the 1st of July, at the end of the fiscal year. I call it to the attention of the gentleman so that if that situation arises it might be corrected in another body. I think it leaves no provision for any report between the 1st of January and the 30th of June. I will call the attention of the department to that.

Mr. MANN. Probably the gentleman thought that making it the 1st of July would require a report for this fiscal year. This fiscal year ends on the 30th of June.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand what the gentleman means, and I think his criticism is well taken. I will call it to the attention of the department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution (H. J. Res. 254) congratulating the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

GRANTING SCHOOL LANDS TO THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20114) granting school lands to the State of The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20114) granting school lands to the State of Louisiana. Be it enacted, etc., That all the unsurveyed lands in the State of Louisiana, Be it enacted, etc., That all the unsurveyed lands in the State of Louisiana which are shown by official protraction of the Government surveys heretofore made to be embraced within sections numbered 16 and which lie in the same township as lands which have been certified or patented in that State under the act approved March 2, 1849, entitled "An act to aid the State of Louisiana in draining swamp lands therein," and the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim swamp lands within their limits," be, and the same are hereby, fixed, reserved, and confirmed to that State as though the official surveys had been regularly extended over such townships.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask how many acres of land are involved in this bill?

Mr. ESTOPINAL. I do not know the exact acreage, but there may be several hundred acres.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I see no report from the Interior Department on the bill. Has any report been obtained? Mr. ESTOPINAL. I have a report which I will send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ESTOPINAL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 20114):

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20114) granting school lands to the State of Louisiana, submit the following report—

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have seen the report of the committee and have read it. I call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that there appears to be no report from the Interior Department. Has there been such a report from the Interior Department?

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Yes; there has been such a report. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report from the Interior Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

LETTER TO ACCOMPANY HOUSE REPORT NO. 255, DATED FEBRUARY 24, 1912, ON H. B. 20114.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, February 2, 1912.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 2, 1912.

Hon. Albert Estopinal,
House of Representatives.

Sir: I am in receipt of your request for the views of this department on H. R. 17042, "A bill for the approval to the State of Louisiana of certain swamp lands."

Lands have heretofore been patented to the State of Louisiana under the swamp-land acts in certain unsurveyed townships where the lines of the townships were fixed by protraction. There are in these townships certain lands which will, when surveyed, pass to the State as section 16 under its grant for the support of public schools, but these lands can not be patented until the surveys have been made and approved, and the fact that the swamp lands have already been patented renders a survey unnecessary and none will therefore probably be made. The object of the bill is to vest in the State the title in the lands which would be section 16 if surveyed.

I know of no objection to the passage of such a bill, but would suggest as a substitute for the pending bill the following:

"A bill granting school lands to the State of Louisiana.

"Be it enected, etc., That all the unsurveyed lands in the State of "A bill granting school lands to the State of Louisiana.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all the unsurveyed lands in the State of Louisiana which are shown by official protraction of the Government surveys heretofore made to be embraced within sections No. 16, and which lie in the same township as lands which have been certified or patented in that State under the act approved March 2, 1840, entitled 'An act to aid the State of Louisiana in draining swamp lands therein,' and the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled 'An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim "swamp lands" within their limits,' be, and the same are hereby, fixed, reserved, and confirmed to that State as though the official surveys had been regularly extended over such townships."

Your attention is called to the fact that the title of the bill proposed is misleading in that it purports to be a bill for the approval of "certain swamp lands," and it would be better to entitle it as above suggested.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,

SAMUEL ADAMS, First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that that report was adopted as the bill, and that is the bill now before the House. But a bill similar to this one has passed the Senate, and I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not time to do that yet. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

that it be considered in the House, and that the Senate bill be substituted therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the Senate bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5059) granting school lands to the State of Louisiana.

An act (S. 5059) granting school lands to the State of Louislana.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the unsurveyed lands in the State of Louislana which are shown by official protraction of the Government surveys heretofore made to be embraced within sections No. 16 and which lie in the same township as lands which have been certified or patented in that State under the act approved March 2, 1849, entitled "An act to alid the State of Louislana in draining swamp lands therein." and the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim swamp lands within their limits," be, and the same are hereby, fixed, reserved, and confirmed to that State as though the official surveys had been regularly extended over such townships.

Mr. ESTORINAL. Mr. Specker, in the content of the State of Arkansas and other is a survey of the content of the same are hereby, fixed, reserved, and confirmed to that State as though the official surveys had been regularly extended over such townships.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, is this the proper time to offer an amendment under unanimous consent? If so, I would like to offer an amendment which was suggested by the depart-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to have unanimous consent to offer an amendment, but he has to have unanimous consent for the other request. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. I object to the substitute at this time, because it seems to affect Arkansas lands. I want to hear the bill read again before I consent to the adoption or consideration of the substitute.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. It is Louisiana land.

Mr. MACON. Is there nothing in there about Arkansas lands? I understood the Clerk to read something about Arkansas lands.

The SPEAKER. The word "Arkansas" is used in quoting the act.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. It does not affect Arkansas lands.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. It does not affect Arkansas lands.
Mr. MACON. With that understanding, I will withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.
Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, after the word "State," on line 3 of this bill, to insert "for the benefit of the public schools." That is on page 2.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ESTOPINAL].
The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as followss:

On page 2, line 1, of said bill insert, after the word "State," the words "for the benefit of public schools."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill. The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESTOPINAL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table. By unanimous consent, the corresponding House bill, H. R. 20114, was laid on the table.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC ENCAMPMENT, PULLMAN, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 77, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Grand Army of the Republic encampment, to be held at Pullman, Wash., in June, 1912.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the general committee of the Grand Army of the Republic encampment, to be held at Pullman, Wash., in the month of June, 1912, such tents, with necessary poles, ridges, and pins, as may be required at said encampment: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said committee designated at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and A. R. Baker, charman of said general committee: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from said A. G. Baker a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said A. G. Baker and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is an error in the printing of Mr. Baker's name. In one place it is printed A. B. Baker and in a subsequent line it is printed A. G. Baker. That might cause some difficulty. It ought to be the same in both places, even if it is wrong.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. His name is A. B. Baker.

Mr. MANN. I am informed by the gentleman from Washington that his name is A. B. Baker. I suggest that correction.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HAY. In line 6, page 2, strike out "G" and insert "B." The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of South Sloux City, in the county of Dakota and State of Nebraska, a municipal corporation organized under the laws of the States of Nebraska, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto, across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near South Sloux City, in the county of Dakota, in the State of Nebraska, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 28, 1906.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas by article 2 of the supplementary articles, executed September 28, 1839, to the treaty of September 27, 1830, signed and executed at Dancing Rabbit Creek by the commissioners of the United States and the chiefs and headmen of the Choctaw Nation of Indians, a section and a half of land was reserved to each of certain Choctaw Indians intended therein to be named; and Whereas there was named in said article 2 Thomas Garland, when the correct name should have been Thomas Wall, one of the intended reservees, which error was subsequent to the date of said supplemental articles discovered; thereupon George W. Martin, a representative of the War Department, set apart to the said Thomas Wall, under the provisions of said supplemental treaty, section 8 and the west half of section 9, in township 19 north, range 16 east, Choctaw meridian, Mississippi, in lieu of any reservation to the said Thomas Garland; and Whereas on September 3, 1831, William Ward, Choctaw agent, and Greenwood Leflore, Mooshalatubbee, Natuckachy, David Folsom, and Joel H. Nail, chiefs and headmen of the Choctaw Nation, executed a certificate saying that the reservation granted to Thomas Garland in the supplement to the treaty was intended to be given to Thomas Wall, there being no such person in the Choctaw Nation as Thomas Garland, and that the fact of Thomas Wall being the person to whom the reservation was intended to be granted was universally known and admitted by everyone acquainted with the objects of the treaty; and and

Whereas the records of the Indian Office show that on December 11, 1833, Thomas Wall made a deed to Anthony Winston covering said tracts, and the sale was approved by Anthony A. Kincannon, who was a commissioner appointed by the War Department to examine into and report on sales made by reservees in accordance with the provisions of the treaty; and
Whereas said sale was never submitted to the President for approval:
Now therefore

Now therefore

Be it enacted, ctc., That the said reservation of section 8 and the west half of section 9, in township 19 north, range 16 east, Choctaw meridian, Mississippi, to Thomas Wall, and the sale thereof by him to Anthony Winston, made on December 11, 1833, be, and the same are hereby, approved, and the title thereto confirmed in the said Thomas Wall and his vendee, the said Anthony Winston; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized and directed to cause the proper entries to be made upon the land records of the land office at Jackson, Miss., and of the General Land Office, showing that said land was reserved to the said Thomas Wall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, evidently there was a mistake in the reprint of the bill, through the inadvertence of some one, because the committee in reporting it, recommended that the whereases be stricken out and that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and new matter inserted; but that is not shown in the print of the bill. I should like to have the gentleman in charge of the bill state what his purpose is if the bill is allowed to come before the House by unanimous consent?

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all the whereases be stricken out and everything after the enacting clause be stricken out, and that the amendment proposed by the committee be inserted after the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. The first thing to do is to get unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know what the gentleman's amendment is. Will the gentleman have it read for information?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to Thomas Wall, now deceased, formerly of Mississippi, for the following-described tracts of land: All of section 8 and the west half of section 9 in township 19 north of range 16 east, Choctaw meridian, Mississippi, and that the sale of said land by said Thomas Wall to Anthony Winston is hereby approved."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while the report on this bill, in the form in which it was printed, was somewhat badly done, to say the least, the report of the department on the bill is equally sloppy.

I will not object to the bill, with the amendment which the gentleman offers, although I suggest that, having stricken out the preamble and then all of the bill, it will be necessary to amend the title, which the committee did not even recommend.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I now offer my amendment. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the Strike out all after the chacking the control of the later of the following-described tracts of land: All of section 8 and the west half of section 9 in township 19 north of range 16 east, Choctaw meridian, Mississippl. and that the sale of said land by said Thomas Wall to Anthony Winston is hereby approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now, the question is, I take it, on striking out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the amendment was to strike out everything after the enacting clause.

Mr. MANN. The preamble comes before the enacting clause. The SPEAKER. The question is on striking out the preamble.

The amendment striking out the preamble was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the title should be amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the patent of certain lands to Thomas Wall in the State of Mississippi."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be so amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LAND FOR PUBLIC HIGHWAY IN CADDO COUNTY, OKLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16611) setting apart a certain tract of land for a public highway, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a tract of land 66 feet wide and about threefourths of a mile in length, situate in Caddo County, State of Oklahoma, described as follows, to wit: Beginning on the section line between sections 14 and 15, township No. 7 north, range 10 west of the Indian meridian, at a point 66 feet south of the right of way of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, thence east on a line parallel with the right of way of said railway for a distance of about threefourths of a mile to the intersection of the public highway running north and south, be, and the same is hereby, set apart as a public highway for the use of the public as such: Provided, That should said highway ever be vacated by any competent authority the title to the said described tract of land shall inure to the then owner of the tract of which it formed a part by the original survey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question as to how the bill came to be passed upon by the Commit-tee on Public Lands instead of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which it properly belongs?

Mr. MORGAN. In answer to the gentleman I will say that the question of jurisdiction was raised, and I am sure there is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Public Lands to usurp any privileges that belong to the Committee on Indian Affairs. But, as shown by the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, a copy of which is in the report, these lands are not Indian lands. By treaty with the Indians they ceded all right, title, and interest to these lands, and hence my view of it was, and I think I am correct, that as a matter of fact they are public lands and properly belong to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Toyan Is it not a fact that no disposition on the part of the Committee on Public Lands

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that this was a part of the original Comanche, Apache, and Kiowa Reservation?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And this part was reserved for agency purposes and is being used now for agency purposes? Mr. MORGAN. It is being used now for agency purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And this road is across this tract of land belonging to the Indians, and it is being used for agency purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As long as it is under control of the Indian agent, is not the Indian agent under the control of the Indian commission, and does not the Indian Committee have control of all matters of this character?

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand, these lands have been re-served by the Interior Department for the Government for agency purposes, and the Indians absolutely have no right, title, or interest to the land because they ceded the land back to the Government, and it was merely reserved by the Secretary of the Interior for the use of the United States and not for the use of the Indians. It is entirely a United States reservation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not under the control and direction of the Indian agency and immediately under the control of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the gentleman is right about that.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that I see no objection to the bill, but I think it is a very bad practice for a gentleman to introduce a bill and put it in the wrong committee, even if he does happen to be a member of that committee. I do not think it is a practice that I can stand for in the future.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to, object, it seems to me that I have a much more valid criticism of the bill than has the gentleman from Texas, although I think his criticism was good.

I notice on an examination of the bill that in describing the and it only describes one side of it. In my experience with real estate if you want to describe a piece of land you have to bound the four sides of it in order to describe it properly. It is not sufficient to bound one side of it. I will ask the gentleman, as he must have had his attention attracted to it by reading the bill, whether he is prepared, if the bill is considered, to bound the four sides of this tract instead of only one side?

Mr. MORGAN. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I will state that my attention was called to the failure to make a correct description by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, and after a reexamination of it I concluded that he was correct. I then went to the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to the maps, and went over the matter, and have prepared an amendment describing both sides of the road.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a further question?

On page 2 of the bill there is a proviso which reads:

Provided, That should said highway ever be vacated by any competent authority the title to the said described tract of land shall inure to the then owner of the tract of which it formed a part by the original survey.

Suppose this highway should be abandoned and not used as a highway, but not vacated by any competent authority, does not the gentleman think that the title ought to pass then, and would the gentleman think that the title ought to pass then, and would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment to insert, in line 7, on page 2, after the word "be," the words "abandoned or," so that it would provide for the disposition of the land in case the highway is abandoned or vacated?

Mr. MORGAN. I would have no objection whatever to that. The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speeker, I set appring a consent that we

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "such," insert the words "on condition that the city of Anadarko, Okla., erect a substantial and suitable fence along the south side of the road hereby set apart, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out all in line 5 after the colon, and all of lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and on page 2 strike out all of line 1 except the word "be" and the commas which precede and follow it, and insert in lieu of all the foregoing the following: "Beginning at the point where the south line of the right of way of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway crosses the section line between sections 14 and 15, township No. 7 north, range 10 west of the Indian meridian; thence south along said section line 66 feet; thence easterly glong a line parallel with the right of way of said railway for a distance of about three-quarters of a mile, to the west line of the public highway running north and south; thence north along the west line of said public highway 66 feet; thence westerly along the south line of the right of way of the aforesaid railway to the place of beginning."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the purpose of the amend-

Mr. MORGAN. It is to more definitely describe the highway. After examining the description in the original bill, I concluded that the highway was not definitely located.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that the Indian Department made a report, and also the Department of the Interior, taking the language of the original bill upon which to base that report. Have they gone over this amended description?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that the bill evidently intended to grant a piece of land for a highway about three-quarters of a mile long on the south side of a railroad right of way. That is shown by the language of the bill, but in describing the tract it described only the south line of the tract and did not bound the other three sides. The gentleman from Oklahoma has merely perfected that by running the north boundary line along the right of way of the railroad and connecting the south boundary line at the two ends with the

Mr. RAKER. In other words, describing a tract of land three-quarters of a mile long and 60 feet wide, or whatever the width may be? Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The width is not described in the present bill? Mr. MANN. It located the south line 66 feet south of the railroad right of way, but that was the only description there

Mr. RAKER. What I wanted to know was whether or not the intention is to describe the same piece of land that was attempted to be described in the original bill?

Mr. MORGAN. That is the purpose of the amendment. Mr. MANN. It is precisely the same piece of land. Mr. RAKER. That settles it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend page 2, line 7, by inserting after the word "be" the words "abandoned, or." The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "be," insert the words "abandoned, or." The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SABINE-NECHES CANAL, PORT ARTHUR, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21960) to authorize the Port Arthur Pleasure Pier Co. to construct a bridge across the Sabine-Neches Canal, in front of the town of Port Arthur.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, ctc., That the Port Arthur Pleasure Pier Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Texas, and its assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Sabine-Neches Canal, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in front of the town of Port Arthur, in the county of Jefferson, in the State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after the word "six," insert the words "Provided, That the said Port Arthur Pleasure Pier Co. is also authorized to cross and occupy with the aforesaid bridge the land owned by the United States adjacent to and along said canal under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may deem equitable and fair to the public."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Dies, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMPORTATION OF ADULTERATED AND LOW-GRADE SEEDS,

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22340) to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated seeds and seeds unfit for seeding purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after six months after the passage of this act the importation into the United States of seeds of alfalfa, barley, Canadian blue grass, Kentucky blue grass, awnless brome grass, buckwheat, clover, field corn, Kafir corn, meadow fescue, flax, millet, oats, orchard grass, rape, redtop, rye, sorghum, timothy, and wheat, or mixtures of seeds containing any of such seeds as one of the principal component parts, which are adulterated or unfit for seeding purposes under the terms of this act, is hereby prohibited; and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture shall, jointly or severally, make such rules and regulations as will prevent the importation of such seeds into the United States: Provided, however, That such seed may be delivered to the owner or consignee thereof under bond, to be recleaned in accordance with and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and when cleaned to the standard of purity specified in this act for admission into the United States such seed may be released to the owner or consignee thereof after the screenings and other refuse removed from such seed shall have been disposed of in a manner prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to the importation of barley, buckwheat, field corn, Kafir corn, sorghum, flax, oats, rye, or wheat not intended for seeding purposes.

SEC. 2. That seed shall be considered adulterated within the meaning of this act—

SEC. 2. That seed shall be considered additerated within the meaning of this act—

First. When seed of red clover contains more than 3 per cent by weight of seed of yellow trefoil, or any other seed of similar appearance to and of lower market value than seed of red clover.

Second. When seed of alfalfa contains more than 3 per cent by weight of seed of yellow trefoil, burr clover and sweet clover, singly or combined.

Third. When any kind or variety of the seeds, or any mixture described in section 1 of this act, contains more than 5 per cent by weight of seed of another kind or variety of lower market value and of similar appearance: Provided, That the mixture of the seed of white and alsike clover, red and alsike clover, or alsike clover and timothy, shall not be deemed an adulteration under this section.

Sec. 3. That seed shall be considered unfit for seeding purposes within the meaning of this act—

First. When any kind or variety of clover or alfalfa seed contains more than one seed of dodder to 5 grams of clover or alfalfa seed, respectively.

respectively.

Second. When any kind or variety of the seeds or any mixture described in section 1 of this act contains more than 3 per cent by weight of seeds of weeds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I see there is a provision that the Secretary of Agriculture shall take the seed and have it cleaned, or it shall be cleaned before put on the market.

All seed that does not come up to standard Mr. MANN. when imported may be cleaned under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. BARTLETT.

Mr. BARTLETT. By giving bond for it.
Mr. FOSTER. That is the only way in which they can take that adulterated seed and clean it?

Mr. MANN. They would either have to return it or clean it. If they can clean it under regulations and have control of the disposition of the refuse, which might be used for chicken feed or bird seed or something of that sort, why they would do it.

Mr. FOSTER. And the regulations are left to the Secretary of Agriculture. Of course, I realize that the adulterated portion taken from the seed, unless it is properly disposed of, might be just as harmful-

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the Secretary makes regulations as to the disposition and says there is no difficulty about that.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this bill to be administered by the customs officials through the Secretary of Agriculture where the seed is admitted into the country?

Mr. MANN. Well, they would do as they do now. matter of fact, when an importation is made the customs officials would furnish a sample to the Secretary of Agriculture for examination.

Mr. FOSTER. Each sample when it is brought over?

Mr. MANN. If there is any question about it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Does the bill except from its provisions importations of wheat? I thought I caught it in the reading.

Mr. MANN. Not wheat used for seed purposes, but wheat which is not intended for seed is excepted, of course.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentelman, also, is it practicable to determine adulteration in seed such as grass seed?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is easily done?

Mr. MANN. It is easily done, very easily done.
Mr. MURDOCK. I have heard that questioned in regard to blue-grass seed, that there is difficulty in telling—that there was a certain amount of normal adulteration in any seed.

Mr. MANN. Of course, a degree of tolerance is specified, and I may say that has been agreed upon by the seed people and accepted by the Department of Agriculture. It is fixed in here.

Mr. MURDOCK. Have we any law in the United States similar to this in regard to domestic seeds?

Mr. MANN. We have not. Mr. MURDOCK. And this accomplishes what, then? Mr. MANN. This accomplishes the prevention of the importation into the United States of those seeds for adulteration purposes. In other words, nearly every civilized nation to-day has a law prohibiting the sale of certain classes of seed in their own country and prohibiting the importation of those seeds into those countries.

And we are, not so much in the last few years as we were before, the dumping ground of the world for poor seed, and it is brought in for the purpose of sale or adulteration, especially alfalfa and clover seed and seeds of that character.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STEAMERS "SYRACUSE" AND "BOSTON."

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22580) to authorize a change of the name of the steamers Suracuse and Boston.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon application of the owner, the Port Huron & Duluth Steamship Co., of Port Huron, Mich., to change the name of the steamer Syracuse, official number 116025, and to change the name of the steamer Boston, official number 3140.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was on the engrossment and third reading of the bill

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

OLD POST-OFFICE BUILDING, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20688) transferring the custody and control of the old post-office building in the city of Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it cnacted, etc., That the custody and control of the old post-office building, situated at the east end of Broad Street, in the city of Charleston, State of South Carolina, be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask some one what is the purpose of the transfer of this building?

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Speaker, the Lighthouse Department is using this building now for its offices and clerks, and the control and custody is in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MURDOCK. To what purpose is the building to be put after this transfer?

Mr. LEGARE. The same purpose. They are using it now and have been using it for several years.

Mr. MURDOCK. They are now occupying the building?

Mr. LEGARE. They are now occupying the building?

Mr. LEGARE. They are now occupying the building and using it for that purpose. That is, one department is using it and the other department has the custody and control of it. We want to place the custody and control in the proper department.

Mr. AUSTIN. It has the unanimous support of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Legare, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the oill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE PROPERTY, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

The next business on the Calender for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13774) providing for the sale of the old post-office property at Providence, R. I., by public auction.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the Bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 10 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902 (32 Stats, L., p. 322), be, and it is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"When said building is completed and occupied by the United States authorities the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell the present post-office, courthouse, and customhouse building and the site thereof, situated at the corner of Weybosset and Custom House Streets, in the city of Providence, and State of Rhode Island, at public auction, after proper advertisement, on such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States; to execute a quitelaim deed to the purchaser thereof, and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, it seems that they are not now to sell this property at an upset price of $300,000.

but this bill proposes an upset price of $200,000.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that later.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I want to say, in the bill providing for the building of the new post office and the sale of the old one, the upset price of $300,000 was placed on the old building. The new building was completed in 1908, and from the 30th of November, 1908, until the present time the old building has been untenanted and un-Efforts have been made by the Secretary of the Treasury to sell it for the price of $300,000, but without success, and the Secretary has reported to the Committee on Public Buildings that the bill originally introduced by me providing for the sale of this old post office at public auction without stating any price would facilitate the disposition of this building. There is not any question that $300,000 can not be obtained.

For the information of the committee, I would like to say that the value of the land upon which the old building stands is $200,000, and the building upon it is unfit for commercial purposes to-day, and according to a report of the gentleman sent by the Treasury Department to make an investigation into the question, it will cost $100,000 to make it tenantable for any Government purpose whatever.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman inform the House as to what was the original cost of that building?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The original cost of the building was $200,000. The building was constructed in 1857, and the land upon which it was built was originally tide flooded. It is estimated that it would cost $50,000 to make the cellars dry. roof is in a dilapidated condition. The building has not got lighting facilities.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is this property well located with reference to business facilities in the city of Providence?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will say that it is admirably located. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has there been any report from the Treasury Department, estimating what the present value of this property is?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. No. The Treasury Department has made investigations, and the best information I can get on that subject-information which, I believe, the Treasury Department indorses-is this fact: That its assessed value-though of course, being a Federal building, it is not actually assessed—is estimated to be $200,000. That would be $25 a square foot. Property on the south is about $20 a square foot. Across the way, in the most desirable location for real-estate purposes in the city of Providence, the value of the land runs from $22 to $45 a square foot. Twenty-five dollars a square foot for this old post-office land is considered a very fair valuation.

wanted the committee to report this bill making the upset price $150,000, because there is serious doubt in my mind as to whether we can realize $200,000 from it. Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman believes, then, that the estimate of $200,000 is a fair valuation of the property?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I do. Mr. RAKER. May I ask the gentleman who set that price? Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I presume Congress did. In the omnibus bill, providing for the erection of a new post office, there was a provision made that the old building should not be disposed of unless the price of $300,000 was obtained.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that the land itself is estimated to be worth at least $200,000?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes; that is the report of the board of Mr. O'SHAUNESSI. 1es; that is the report of the board of ssessors. But they frequently make mistakes.

Mr. RAKER. What board of assessors is that?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The board of assessors of Providence.

Mr. RAKER. What is the actual cash value of the building?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. They value the building for assessment purposes. ment purposes at $60,000.

Now, I have letters from real-estate men down there who say that if anybody wanted to make use of the land they would have to tear down this building, because to make it tenantable or habitable it would require an expenditure of $150,000 or

Mr. RAKER. Is the gentleman of the opinion that this property ought not to be struck off at public auction for any bid less

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. No; absolutely not. I know very well that that sum would never be obtained.

Mr. RAKER. If the land is estimated now by the board of assessors to be worth $200,000 and the building is estimated to be worth $60,000, it seems to me there ought to be some limitation put upon the auctioneer to the effect that unless he receives $260,000 or more he can not sell the property.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes; but here is a report to the effect that it would take $150,000 to put the building in a habitable condition. Now, if you add $150,000 to $200,000, that would be $350,000. That property is worth—

Mr. RAKER. Maybe the property would be worth $600,000 or $700,000 when it was put into that shape

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, the committee has investigated this case carefully from time to time, and secured all the information it could from Providence, and this bill comes here with a unanimous report. No interest of the Government can suffer under the terms of this bill, because the Secretary of the Treasury will obtain for this property every dollar that any person is willing to pay for it.

Mr. RAKER. But there is no protection provided for the Government, so far as the auctioneer is concerned. He can let it go at $200,000, if he cares to.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized Mr. AUSTIN. The Secretary of the Treasury is authto sell it, provided it brings a sum not less than $200,000.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any competition for the purchase of this building?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. The Government would be glad if the gentleman from California would bid $250,000 on it.

Mr. RAKER. I would bid about 200 cents, unless the gentleman from Rhode Island will make the loan, without interest and without limit as to time; but that does not answer my objection. Because a Member of Congress is unable to buy buildings of this kind, I do not think he should stand idly by and permit action to be had, unless you provide that they shall not sell for less than a certain price.

Mr. AUSTIN. There is an upset price of $200,000.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman think that is sufficient? Mr. AUSTIN. I think it is sufficient, and I think when the Member who represents the Providence district stands on the floor of this House and makes a statement about this property, its value, and so forth, his colleagues ought to accept that statement.

Mr. RAKER. I do not understand that my question implies any doubt of the gentleman's statement concerning anything that he is familiar with; but he is not here as a real estate agent, and does not so represent himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. He is here as the representative of the people of Providence, looking out and caring for their interests, and I would be governed by his statement about a local proposition, just as I would be influenced by a statement on a local proposition, if it was made by the gentleman from California concerning his own district.

Mr. MANN. Then, I should like to sell some land to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear a further statement in reference to this.

Mr. PETERS. Has there not been an attempt already to sell this property at public auction at an upset price of $300,000?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. From November 30, 1908, up to the present time there have been repeated attempts to sell the property for $200,000, and those efforts have been absolutely unsuccessful and a flat failure. It is in order to get rid of an eyesore in the city of Providence, and in order to get rid of an eyesore in the city of Providence, and in order to put money into the United States Treasury, which my colleagues ought to consider a very commendable effort on the part of any Representative—to put money into the Treasury of the United States—that I urge the passage of this bill [applause]; and incidentally to provide a taxpayer for the city of Providence, because the city of Providence does not get any benefit from it now, for no taxes are being paid upon it, and it is a detriment to real estate values in the neighborhood and a positive hindrance to the advance that ought to take place in an up-to-date city like Providence.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, I understand from the gentleman that he believes the property which the Government holds and is not using should be put in the hands of private owners and the Government get something for it, so as to build up the country.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Absolutely.
Mr. RAKER. That is the gentleman's position on matters of this kind?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. Would that apply generally?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. If the Government wanted this property, I would be pleased to see it use the property; but I hate to see it lying there idle, a detriment to advance and a forbidding object to those who pass by it. I suppose we might say that it is only tenanted by the rats just at present. But if you open it up, enterprise will develop it and business will improve and the people in general will be satisfied. I know that my friend from California [Mr. RAKER] will be satisfied when he comes down and sees the change in the neighborhood.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "receipt," insert: "Provided. That said building and site shall not be sold for any sum less than $200,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.
On motion of Mr. O'SHAUNESSY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

STATISTICS OF COTTON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

was the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish statistics concerning the amount of cotton ginned; the quantity of raw cotton consumed in manufacturing establishments of every character; the quantity of baled cotton on hand; the number of active consuming cotton spindles; and the quantity of cotton imported and exported, with the country of origin and destination.

SEC. 2. That the statistics of the quantity of cotton ginned shall show the quantity ginned from each crop prior to September 1, September 25, October 18, November 1, November 14, December 1, December 13, January 10, and March 1, and shall be published as soon as possible after the consuming respective dates. The quantity of cotton consumed in manufacturing respective dates. The quantity of cotton consumed in manufacturing respective dates. The quantity of cotton consumed in manufacturing respective dates. The quantity of cotton consumed in manufacturing respective dates. The quantity of cotton consumed in manufacturing respective dates. The quantity of cotton in the published and exported shall relate to each calendar month and shall be published by the Bureau of the Census of the quantity of cotton ginned shall carry with it the latest available statistics concerning the quantity of cotton consumed, stocks of baled cotton on hand, the number of cotton-consuming spindles, and the quantity of cotton imported and exported. All of these publications containing statistics of cotton shall be mailed by the Director of the Census to all cotton ginners, cotton manufacturers, and cotton warehousemen, and to all daily newspapers throughout the United States. The Director of the Census shall furnish and the United States. The Director of the Census shall furnish and publish the said Bureau of Statistics shall publish the same in connection shall compile, by correspondence or the use of published reports and documents, any available information concerning the production, consumption, and stocks of cotton in foreign countries, and the number of cotton-consuming spindles in such countries. Each report published by the Bureau of the Census regarding cotton shall contain an abstract of the latest available information obtained under the provisions of this section, and the Director of the Census shall furnish the same to the Department of Agriculture for publication in connection with the reports of that department concerning cotton in the same manner as in the case of statistics relating to the United States.

Sec. 6. That the joint resolution approved February 9, 1905, and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say to the gentleman that a short time ago we passed a bill something like this relating to tobacco statistics. It may be highly desirable to pass a bill like this, but it is quite evident that if we do we will soon have bills in relation to the various grain statistics and other interests in the country. Hence, it seems to me quite desirable to have a bill very care fully considered and properly amended. As an illustration of this bill it provides for the repeal of the joint resolution approved March 2, 1909. That is the only description of the joint resolution of that date, any one of which would be covered by this provision, which does not seem to me to be a very careful preparation of the bill.

The committee that reports this bill will be reached before long on the ordinary calendar in the call of committees. it not be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman to let this bill go until that time, so that when it is perfected we may adopt a policy which very likely will be applied to other interests?

I have no objection to the gathering of cotton statistics.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. We are willing to accept an amendment prepared by the gentleman from Illinois if he will offer

I have not formulated any amendment, but this bill provides in several places for the duplication of the publication of reports. What reason can be given-there may be a very good one-why the Census Bureau should publish certain information and turn it over to the Agricultural Department to publish the same information? Why should the Agricultural Department publish certain information and turn it over to the Census Office to publish the same information? We duplicate more or less in the Government business, but I know of no other case where it is proposed to have the department publish a bulletin and send it to another department to be published again.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. It is the custom with reference to the reports of the amount of cotton ginned. The Director of the Census furnishes it to the Agricultural Department and the Agricultural Department publishes it in conjunction with their report.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman does not claim that there is any occasion for both departments publishing precisely the same information, each sending it to every one interested in the country?

Mr. BELL of Georgia. There is no additional cost. Mr. MANN. Of course there is an additional cost when two departments publish the same information.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution that the gentleman refers to is one under which some statistics are being gathered regarding the amount of cotton on hand at the cotton factories. Now the purpose is to report the amount of cotton exported, the amount imported, the amount of cotton owned at the factory, the amount of cotton consumed, the amount of cotton ginned, all in one report. It is a very important measure, to the cotton producer especially. The ginners' reports coming out twice a month in the fall are published all over the country in the daily papers. The producer ought to have all the information about the cotton on hand at the mill and the cotton exported from this country, in order that he may know the situa-tion of the cotton market here. He has not the information now, and this resolution will give him the information that he so much needs.

Mr. MANN. I say that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to have all the information gathered and diffused throughout the country. As I said with reference to the resolution that was proposed to be repealed, who ever drew the bill— and I suppose it was drawn in the department—has drawn it very loosely, proposing to repeal a joint resolution of a certain date when there are three joint resolutions of that date, something which evidently no member of the committee had taken the trouble to look up, but I did.

Mr. HEFLIN. We are willing to have you offer an amendment to cure that defect.

Mr. MANN. I only referred to the joint resolution as an evidence of the loose preparation of the bill. Now, in that connection the bill says:

Each report published by the Bureau of the Census regarding cotton shall contain an abstract of the latest available information obtained under the provisions of this section, and the Director of the Census shall furnish the same to the Department of Agriculture for publication in connection with the reports of that department concerning cotton, in the same manner as in the case of statistics relating to the United States.

What is the object of republishing that by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is perfectly proper, because the Director of the Census sends out these statistics twice a month on the amount of cotton ginned during the ginning season. when the Agricultural Department makes its report on the final production, the Director of the Census gives the statistics that he has on the amount of cotton ginned.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama does not, any more than I, believe that as a rule it is necessary to have two departments publish precisely the same information and place it in the hands of the same people. No one would defend that I do not know what the purpose is here.

Mr. HEFLIN. As I said before, one reports twice a month during the ginning season, and the other reports once a year. When the Secretary of Agriculture makes his final report, he gets a great deal of this information from the Director of the Census and gives the sum total.

Mr. MANN. How often does the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture report on cotton?

Mr. HEFLIN. It reports annually as to the production of Mr. MANN. I think it reports very much oftener than an-

Mr. HEFLIN. It reports on crop conditions and crop estimates.

Mr. MANN. It reports every little while. Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. On conditions of the crop, the prospects of the crop, and then finally as to what the final yield is.

Mr. MANN. But this requires publication of these census statistics with every report of the Department of Agriculture as to the condition of the crop a number of times a year.

Mr. HEFLIN. That can not be true, because there is no cotton ginned in the late spring or the summer. Cotton is ginned from about the last week in August until February.

Mr. MANN. But this information is not confined to cotton ginned. This information is not merely the ginning of the cotton. It covers the whole subject of the production and the consumption of cotton.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true; but after the ginners' report stops we want this information about cotton on hand at the mills and the amount of cotton bought by foreign spinners to continue to go to the producer of cotton. It will give him information at the time he plants his crop, and he can determine whether to plant for a large crop or a small crop. He will know about the supply of cotton and how rapidly it is being consumed, and he ought to have this information.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman further. A few weeks ago we passed a bill upon this subject which came from the Committee on Agriculture, covering the publication of these reports so that, as was then stated, the cotton raiser might know how much cotton to plant. This bill does not take into consideration at all the passage of that former bill, and in my judgment the two are in conflict from start to finish. about that?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think so. We have been gathering these statistics, as I said before, as to the amount of cotton ginned, and about four years ago I introduced a resolution requiring the Director of the Census to gather statistics of the amount of cotton on hand at the cotton mills, and Mr. Lever, of South Carolina, introduced one also. His resolution, as amended by the committee, passed. But under his resolution But under his resolution these statistics were gathered and published three times a year. We want these reports made at least once a month, and during the ginning season to be published with the ginners' report, which is at least twice a month.

Mr. MANN. But we passed a bill here the other day covering that.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; that did not relate to cotton. Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It related to nothing but cotton.

Mr. HEFLIN. What bill was that?
Mr. MANN. A bill that came from the Committee on Agriculture, I think, covering this same subject.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, the gentleman refers to the Lever bill. Not at all. That simply postponed to a later date than is now provided for the estimation of the amount of acreage in cotton, and the report on the condition of the cotton crop. That does not pertain at all to the kind of statistics here provided for. I introduced a resolution along this line at this session, and the gentleman from Arkausas [Mr. Oldfield] introduced a resolution and so did Mr. Lever on this same subject. These resolutions were taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Census and the resolution under consideration now contains the provisions that my resolution had in it and some of the provisions contained in the resolutions of Mr. Oldfield and Mr. LEVER.

Mr. MANN. Unless I am very much mistaken, and I am inclined to rely upon my memory in this matter, the bill we passed the other day covers the collection of statistics relating to cotton.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not as to cotton ginned or manufactured or cotton on hand. It is the amount of acreage and the condition of the growing crop.

Mr. MANN. That may be. Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman has in mind the Lever bill, which relates to the growing cotton crop. The Lever bill provides that the report on the crop condition be made later than is now provided for, because the condition of the cotton crop may be excellent in June and very materially damaged in July, and if it is damaged then the good-condition report in June has seriously injured the cotton producer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to admit I know nothing on the subject of raising cotton or collecting information concerning it, and I shall not at this time interpose an objection in the face of the great demand of gentlemen here representing cotton-growing districts. I am quite confident that this bill ought to be amended in a good many particulars both in the interest of economy to the Government in publication and probably in the interest of the cotton raiser who wants to obtain the information. But that can not be done where it is considered in this way.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Director of the Census was present with myself, Mr. Oldfield, and Mr. Lever when the subcommittee agreed on this resolution.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman one question in reference to this bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if there is any change to be made in the phraseology of this resolution that can be done in the Senate, for we are very anxious to get this resolution passed to-day.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say that I do not propose to object to the consideration of this bill, but there are some things in here the department will be compelled to do which, I think, entail an expense that is unnecessary and will do no good. Here it is:

All of these publications containing statistics of cotton shall be made by the Director of the Census to all cotton ginners, cotton manufac-turers, and cotton warehousemen, and to all daily newspapers through-out the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that a matter of such importance, when it goes out here at Washington, is carried through the Associated Press to every newspaper in the country that has any interest whatever in the growing or marketing of cotton. That news goes into every cotton merchant's establishment, goes into all the cotton exchanges of the country, and from there is also immediately distributed. Now, you compel them here to go to the expense of sending these com-Such information will armunications to these newspapers. rive from 24 hours to 3 days after they have had the information, and it is an absolute unnecessary expense.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas. I made the suggestion that this information ought to be mailed to the daily newspapers, and I will tell my friend from Texas why. The ginners' report is now published in these newspapers. We provided three years ago to collect statistics three times a year as to the cotton on hand at the factories. I have never seen one of those reports in a newspaper

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not catch the statement of the gentleman as to what provision had been made.

Mr. HEFLIN. The statistics gathered about three times a year of the amount of cotton on hand at cotton factories was provided for about three years ago, nearly four, and I have never seen one of those reports in a newspaper. the ginners' report often in various newspapers over the country. Now, this resolution provides that the amount of cotton on hand at factories shall be published on the same card with the amount of cotton ginned and how much cotton has been imported and exported. Now, we propose to give this information to the producers of cotton and give it as much publicity as possible through the daily newspapers. All of the daily newspapers do not have the Associated Press service. These papers will publish these official statistic cards when they receive them, and by that means we give this information to the cotton belt at least and those who are mostly interested.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I shall not object to the consideration of the gentleman's resolution, but I do say that, in my judgment, it entails an unnecessary expense upon the Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. It will be a very little expense.
Mr. SLAYDEN. Why, you must have clerks to prepare the information, you must have clerks to mail the information, and then comes the cost of transporting the information which, when they get it, is some three or four days old. I want to say while I am on that question that I do not believe the South is benefited by all the statistical work that has been done. In the old days when the Department of Agriculture made an estimate of the crop they invariably, at least in nineteen times out of twenty, guessed in favor of the farmer. Now the amount of cotton gluned every month is presumed to be counted accurately, and an increase in the size of the crop is indicated; if there is a larger yield, the notice of that increased yield is bound to have its influence on the market. Personally, as a man who grows cotton and has been interested in it, I would rather have the old condition when the Department of Agriculture guessed in favor of the farmer.

Mr. HEFLAN. I want to say to my friend, in that connection, that I was not in Congress when the act was passed requiring the ginners to report, but since we have the ginners' report I want as full and complete information from the manufacturers and as to exportation and importation of cotton as is possible. And I will say further to my friend, if the Government did not make these gin reports, you have a national association now that does, and the speculator would indulge in what they would call a ginners' report, and if we are going to have these reports at all I prefer to have the sanction of the Government back of them, in order that we may regulate them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has offered an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:
Page 5, line 9, after the word "resolution," insert the following:
"Authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish additional statistics."

That simply identifies the resolution. Mr. MANN

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEFLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTIONS OR COLLEGES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16690) for the relief of scientific institutions or colleges of learning having violated sections 3297 and 3207a of the Revised Statutes and the regulations thereunder.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized on appeal to him made to abate, remit, and refund all taxes or assessments for taxes the Hability for which is asserted against any scientific institution or college of learning on account of any alcohol withdrawn from bond free of tax in accordance with the provisions of sections 3297 and 3297a, Revised Statutes, and not used as authorized by the above-mentioned law and regulations thereunder: Provided, That no assessment made of tax imposed shall be abated or refunded as to any alcohol so withdrawn and used for beverage purposes: And provided further, That all applications for relief under this act shall be filed on or before July 1, 1912, and no liability incurred on or after January 1, 1912, shall be relieved against hereunder.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation about how much revenue is affected by virtue of this and how much penalty is involved?

Mr. KITCHIN. The department says it will be but a trifle.

They did not figure up the amount.

Mr. RAKER. What is the object of the bill? Is it to relieve certain individuals from punishment?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; only to relieve scientific institutions of learning and hospitals using alcohol for purposes authorized, but not using it in the manner prescribed by the rules of the department. The Secretary of the Treasury has the power to permit them to use alcohol without payment of the tax, but it made a ruling they should denature it before using. Some of these hospitals and institutions-most of them hospitals-used it for purposes authorized without denaturing it, and, as the department says, unwittingly incurred the penalties.

Mr. RAKER. Can the gentleman give an idea about how much is involved, so far as penalties are concerned?

Mr. KITCHIN. Most of the penalties incurred are by the hospitals. We have not the figures for all. The hospitals in Washington are liable to something like $10,000 or $15,000, and much more by the hospitals in Baltimore.

Mr. RAKER. The penalty? Mr. KITCHIN. The penalty.

Mr. MANN. The amount involved would be mostly penalties. Mr. KITCHIN. There is no other amount involved but pen-

Mr. RAKER. Is it not somewhat remarkable that scientific institutions and colleges of learning, that should have knowledge of these matters, should come in and be relieved from punishment when the ordinary man throughout the country, the moment he is found violating the law, is jerked up or slammed into prison and the penalty is heaped upon him without even a chance for explaining?

Mr. KITCHIN. No such situation is presented here. These hospitals used the alcohol for the purpose authorized by the statute, but they just did not denature it before using it, as prescribed by the rules of the department.

Mr. RAKER. I see.
Mr. KITCHIN. Under the act passed years ago if they simply failed to denature 1 pint of a barrel of alcohol they were liable to penalty of double the tax on the whole barrel, although they might denature the rest of the 50 gallons.

The Committee on Ways and Means considered this bill very carefully and its opinion was unanimous.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Revenue," in the third line on page 1, insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Amendment No. 2. Strike out the words beginning with "on," in line 5, page 2, and ending with the word "January." in line 7, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within one year from the date of the approval of this act, and no liability incurred on or after March."

Mr. Speaker-Mr. MANN.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the amendment provides. It is impossible to tell.

Mr. KITCHIN. The amendment provides that before remitting the penalties they must have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

MANN. I understand that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, on the second amendment—
Mr. MANN. What does the second amendment strike out?
Mr. KITCHIN. It strikes out the words in lines 5 and 6, to wit, "on or before July 1, 1912, and no liability incurred on or after."

Mr. MANN. That is on page 2? Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is on page 2. Mr. MANN. The Clerk read, "On line 5, strike out," and so

Mr. KITCHIN. He read the second amendment. Let the Clerk read that again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words beginning with the word "on," in line 5, page 2, and ending with the word "January," in line 7, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within one year from the date of the approval of this act, and no liability incurred on or after March."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "revenue," in the third line on page 1, insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Kitchin, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COAL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 244) extending the operation of the act of June 10, 1910, to coal lands in Alabama.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 244) extending the operation of the act of June 10, 1910, to coal lands in Alabama.

to coal lands in Alabama.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the public lands containing coal deposits in the State of Alabama which are now being withheld from homestead entry under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operations of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883, may be entered under the homestead laws of the United States subject to the provisions, terms, conditions, and limitations prescribed in the act entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," approved June 10, 1910.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill, I believe, was originally prepared in the department, as appears by the Senate report on the bill. But I notice the bill says that all of the public lands containing coal deposits in the State of Alabama shall be subject to homestead entry. That would make them subject to homestead entry despite the fact that there might be a public building on the land. Maybe that would not be subject to homestead entry, but there might be reserved lands.

Now, in all the bills of this kind that we have passed heretofore we have provided that the unreserved public lands shall be subject to homestead entry. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent] if he would be satisfied to strike out the words "all the" in line 3 and insert the word "unreserved," so that it would read "That unreserved public lands," and so forth? That will cover all the lands that are named in the report.

Mr. DENT. There is no objection to that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. MANN. The gentleman sees the point. If you say "all the public lands" you do not know what you are authorizing a homestead upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann]: The purpose of this bill is to make the public lands in Alabama conform to the general law.

Mr. MANN. The general law provides that unreserved lands shall be subject to homestead entry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is mistaken in act. In 1883 a large number of mineral lands were being bought in Alabama under the general law.

Mr. MANN. I have examined that law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And there was a special bill passed as to Alabama for the purpose of withdrawing the mineral lands in the State, which takes in all the mineral lands in Alabama, where they can not be sold and can not come in under the preemption law, where these lands apply. Now, there were settlements on some of these coal lands that have not got workable coal on them. The purpose of this proposition is workable coal on them. The purpose of this proposition is merely to let them perfect their homestead rights to the surface. course, if it was not for this statute that was passed in 1893, withdrawing these mineral lands in Alabama from being offered for sale under the general law, they would have been disposed of long ago or could be disposed of to-day.

Will the gentleman allow me to correct him,

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him, because he evidently has not read the act of 1883.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes; I have read it a good many

Mr. MANN. That act does not withdraw any land from sale. Mr. MANN. That act does not withdraw any land from sale. On the contrary, it provides that all land there shall be subject to sale, and expressly provides as to lands theretofore found to be mineral lands, that they must be offered for sale first. That is the difficulty about making a homestead entry on that land now. The law requires that it shall first be offered for sale.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing that that land shall be homesteaded, but I do not want to have any land homesteaded that the Government has reserved for special purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no purpose in this bill to do

Mr. MANN. I understand that, but the language of the bill would have covered it.

Mr. DENT. I accept the amendment offered by the gentle-

On motion of Mr. Dent a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended in accordance with its text.

MANUEL AGÜERO Y JUNQUÉ, OF CUBA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 91, authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Mr. Manuel Agüero y Junqué, of Cuba.

The joint resolution was read, as follows: The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, ctc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. Manuel Agliero y Junqué, of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point:
Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Manuel Agliero y Junqué shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Manuel Agüero y Junqué shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board:
And provided further, That in the case of the said Manuel Agüero y Junqué the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

HUMBERTO MENCIA AND JUAN DAWSON, OF SALVADOR.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 87, authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Messrs. Humberto Mencia and Juan Dawson, of Salvador.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to permit Messrs. Humberto Mencia and Juan Dawson, of Salvador, to receive instruction at the United States Milliary Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Humberto Mencia and Juan Dawson shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give their utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Humberto Mencia and Juan Dawson shall not be admitted to the academy until they shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that they, or either of them, shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board: And provided further. The SPEAKER Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, is this the Republic of San Salvador, or is it an insular possession?
The SPEAKER. It is the Republic of Salvador.
Mr. CANNON. How long has it been a Republic?

Mr. HAY. It has been a Republic off and on for a good while.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the pardon of the gentleman from Virginia. He thought the gentleman from Illinois was addressing the Chair for information.

Mr. CANNON. I was seeking information.

Mr. HAY. I am no more familiar with the history of the changing Government of Salvador than is the gentleman from

Mr. CANNON. I was under the impression that San Salvador was an insular possession of Great Britain.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; this is an independent government. Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit me, there is an island in the West Indies of that name which is an English possession.

Mr. HAY. This is an independent government, a government in Central America.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is not the island?

Mr. MANN. No. We had an arbitration with this country a few years ago. It is very evident that the names mentioned in the bill are not English names, so far as the race is concerned.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am not getting much geographical information.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman has learned that it is an independent government in Central America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, before the resolution is passed may I ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Is it the policy of Congress to admit to the Military and Naval Academy generally people from foreign countries?

Mr. HAY. It is not; only from the Governments in Central and South America. There have been some from China and Japan admitted, but I do not recall any coming from European countries

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course that can only be done by an act of Congress. It is difficult sometimes to get some of our own men into the academy.

Mr. HAY. This is a matter of courtesy; a matter which the State Department thinks ought to be done in order to encourage friendly feelings between these countries.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the gentleman any expectation of legislation increasing the number at the Military Academy?

Mr. HAY. I have heard of none. The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was read a third time and passed.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21532) to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to this bill, I want to say that I have not had time to fully consider it, as other Members of the House have not. I desire to say that I am opposed, on principle, to special charters being granted by Congress. I do not know precisely what the provisions of this bill are, but I fear that under the guise of an eleemosynary corporation they will be permitted to transact business of all kinds and character in competition with the citizens of this country who have to make a living.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a provision in the bill to the effect that the money they have invested for the purpose of producing funds necessary to carry out the purposes of this corporation shall be exempt from taxation. There are various corporation shall be exempt from taxation. The contrary to good public policy other provisions that I think are contrary to good public policy other provisions that I think are contrary to good public policy other provisions that I think are contrary to good public policy. if they go as far as the language seems to indicate. Without reading the provisions more carefully than I have had the opportunity to do, I would not say that I would object to it if I had time to consider it, but I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he let this go over until some other unanimous-consent day. I shall have to object to it if it is pressed

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve an objection, so that if the gentleman from Missouri withdraws his I can make it when we get through.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve an objection, and I object to it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and it is stricken from the calendar. This is the end of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill S. 2819, "An act to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900," as amended, now on the Private Calendar, and also the report, No. 467, that accompanies it, reprinted to correct certain clerical errors

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it so ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this concludes the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

The SPEAKER. It does. There are two other bills upon the calendar, but they were not put on soon enough to be considered to-day.

PROHIBITING ADMISSION OF ADULTERATED SEEDS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 22340) to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated seeds and seeds unfit for seeding purposes was passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LATE GOV. AYCOCK, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on the night of Thursday, April 4, the greatest living North Carolinian, while addressing an audience in Birmingham, Ala., fainted, and immediately thereafter passed away. In my lifetime I have known no greater man. I rank him side by side with the great Zebulon B. Vance.

Gov. Charles B. Aycock was to have delivered his opening speech in his campaign for the United States Senate in the city of Raleigh on the 12th of April. That speech had been carefully prepared. It was never delivered, but it has been printed, and it is so elevating in its tone, so statesmanlike from beginning to end, so tolerant in its views of those who opposed him, that when I read it I could not help thinking that this great and good man felt that he was standing on the brink. All the people of North Carolina, Republicans and Democrats, colored and white, women and children—every person who ever heard the name of Charles B. Aycock-will appreciate if this House will give unanimous consent that that speech, which appears in the Raleigh News and Observer of Sunday, be printed in the RECORD, and after reading the last few sentences of his speech I am going to make that request.

We stand a-tiptoe on the misty mountain height and see the morning sun make purple the glories of the east. We are entering upon a new day, the day of equality and of opportunity, the hour when every man shall be free to work mightly for himself until his soul, filled to satisfaction, shall overflow with a common benefit to mankind, owing no tribute to anyone and bound only to love his fellow man and serve his God as to him may seem best.

"May these things be;"
Sighin' she spoke;
"I fear they will not,
Dear, but let us type them now
In our own lives, and this proud watchword rest,
Of equal."

Equal! That is the word! On that word I plant myself and my party—the equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity "to burgeon out all that there is within him."

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I now ask the Speaker to submit my request. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the speech of the late Gov. Aycock, to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection. The speech is as follows:

The speech is as follows:

Ladles and gentlemen, I ought to look my happiness to-night and not be reduced to the inadequacy of words with which to express my appreciation of your greeting. I come to talk to you as a simple Democrat, talking to fellow Democrats, for I am a plain and simple man, who loves his friend and has never been hated enough by any man to make him hate again in return. And I am a Democrat. I am not a conservative or a reactionary Democrat. I am not a progressive Democrat, for the word "Democrat" with me is a noun substantive of so fine and large import that it admits of no addition or diminution by any qualifying word or phrase.

WHAT IS A DEMOCRAT?

WHAT IS A DEMOCRAT?

WHAT IS A DEMOCRAT?

What is a Democrat? He is an individualist. He believes in the right of every man to be and to make of himself all that God has put into him. He is a man who believes and practices the doctrine of equal rights and the duty and obligation of seeing to it as far as he can that no man shall be denied the chances in life which God intended for him to have. He is a man who believes in the Declaration of Independence, and who is filled with that spirit of equality which has made this country of ours the refuge of the oppressed of all the world and the hope of this age and of all ages to come.

It is this spirit of democracy and of equal opportunity—for the terms are interchangeable and are equal to each other—which has conquered America, causing the three millions scattered along the coast at the end of the Revolutionary War to swarm with mighty energy and power over the Alleghenies, press across the Mississippl Valley, to run with haste across the prairies, to climb with energy the mighty Rocky Mountains, and never to the until they stood with unfagging energy and gazed upon the rolling and majestic sweep of the mighty Pacific.

One sometimes stops and asks himself why the restless energy, the untiring seeking after new land which has characterized this American people? What is it that has made them give up the comfort and ease of civilized home to live in vast prairies and lonely mountains, far from one another and from all the conveniences of more thickly populated sections? The answer can be found in the determination of every American to find a larger freedom, and when this has failed him in the crowded cities and thickly settled farm districts, he has moved elsewhere to find it.

But the mountains and plains have been conquered. The lands have all been settled. There is no other place for men to seek and they must find this larger liberty at home or forego it forever. The task, therefore, of securing liberty comes to us afresh. It is no longer possible for men to run away from oppression and inequality. It is no longer within their power to find this larger liberty elsewhere, and they must work it out for themselves in the crowded cities and in the thickly populated homesteads. This is the task of the present hour.

homesteads. This is the task of the present hour.

THE PROBLEM OF THE HOUR.

During the span of my life now just a little more than half a century, I have seen this struggle of the people for continued and enlarged freedom tirelessly seeking to work itself out; I have seen the Nation grow in wealth and enormous fortunes piled up; I have seen railroads built until every part of the country is in touch with every other; I have seen the telegraph and telephone bringing all the ends of the Nation together; I have seen industry develop and grow and wax strong and mighty, producing fabulous wealth and enormous products; and I have seen the earth perform her duty in the yield to the industry and science of man until her products are enough to feed and clothe and house every human being abundantly; I have heard the great orators declaim that with the coming of this wealth there should come also a better age and a finer chance for those who sweat and struggle and toll and make the wealth, and yet I have looked in vain for the coming of that hour, and as I read the current history of the times, I find strikes and lockouts and hunger and cold and suffering greater than when Great Britain acknowledged the independence of the Thirteen American Colonies.

We have just touched the beginning of productiveness. The scientist and the hashes are and the current history of the third and the productiveness.

Great Britain acknowledged the independence of the Thirteen American Colonies.

We have just touched the beginning of productiveness. The scientist and the business man, the inventor, and the captains of industry stand ready to-day to produce for the world all that it needs for sustenance, for comfort, and for reasonable luxury. The task of the statesmen of this hour is to devise some method by which this enormous production shall be for the utilization of the multitude rather than for the appropriation of the few. This is a task which has ever been upon the hearts of all thoughtful and well-informed men of generous disposition, but the appeal was never quite so compelling as it is at this hour. With the wealth in the country so great as to startle imagination, to stand in the presence of the thousands of hungry and cold strikers at Lawrence, Mass., and watch the struggles of the coal miners, seeking for a decent living; to see men in the greatest trust and richest organization on earth working 12 hours a day every day, including Sunday, on a wage that barely keeps body and soul together; and to realize that these things are happening despite the efforts of right-minded men with good hearts, humbly seeking wisdom from God sufficient to enable them to correct these conditions, makes one feel with Tennyson, like "An infant crying in the night,

"An infant crying in the night, An infant crying for the light, And with no language but a cry."

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY THE ONE REMEDY.

And yet I can not bring myself to believe that the problem is unsolvable. Yea, I believe that it has already been solved and the solution has been forgotten by us. It was solved in the single phrase, "Equal opportunity to all and special privilege to none." It found its correct exposition in the inaugural address of President Jefferson when he insisted that the Government should be economically conducted to the end that labor should be lightly burdened.

This latter is a simple sentence. It has not in it a single striking quality. It is so plain, it is so easy, that it is not like the solution of a difficult problem, and being easy and plain, we have forgotten and failed to apply it. We have ever since this utterance been going steadily away from it and seeking to find equality of opportunity in the extension of special privileges to some in the hope that out of their abundance they would make easier the condition of all. We have for all these years been supposing that it was possible to better the condition of the workingman by taxing him for the benefit of special industries so that these enriched industries might in turn play my Lord Bountiful to him, forgetful of the axiomatic principle underlying Jefferson's phrase, that after all, all taxation comes out of labor itself, for wealth is nothing but the accumulated product of labor translated into things of use.

I lay down this principle: No man who is not a creator of wealth pays any tax. Customhouse officers, the collector of internal revenue, the sherliff, the tax collector, may collect taxes out of him because he has in his possession wealth created by others, but he himself does not contribute to the support of his government in any degree. When he pays his so-called tax, he charges it to someone else, and usually makes this other person pay interest and profit on the tax which he has ostensibly paid.

If this be true—and it is true and no man can successfully dispute

If this be true—and it is true and no man can successfully dispute it—then there is no possibility of giving superior advantages to labor by any tax which has yet been devised by the ingenuity of man. And this brings us easily and naturally to some discussion of the method of taxation adopted by the National Government, and now in force under the legislation of the Republican Party, and which has been in force with some changes and modifications with a tendency ever upward, since 1860. There is not a tax law existing, there is not a special privilege enriching some at the expense of many now in force in the United States, which is not in force by reason of legislation passed by the Republican Party. There is not a swollen fortune—which my stenographer properly wrote, stolen fortune—threatening the structure of our Government, the peace of the Nation, and the hope of the age that is not the creation of Republican legislation; and the most of it is based upon the one question of taxation.

$110 A YEAR TARIFF TAX PAID BY EACH FAMILY.

$110 A YEAR TARIFF TAX PAID BY EACH FAMILY.

It is no wonder that our forefathers went to war upon this great question. It is no wonder that our early English forefathers won every step in the advancement of liberty around this single question. I am almost tempted to say that no battle has been fought and won in behalf of humanity, in favor of enlarged liberty and greater opportunity, that has not been fought around this single question of taxation. The United States raises annually out of taxation on imports about $330.000,000, and for every dollar of this $330,000,000 that goes into the Treasury at least five other dollars go into the treasuries of the special interests. Add these sums together and they make $1,980,000,000, which is $22 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Assuming that there are five members in each family, this would be $110 to be paid by the head of each family, and this payment is a tax, and the worst feature of this tax is that one-sixth of the tax goes into the Treasury of the United States to secure for us a proper conduct of our Government, while five-sixths of it goes into the treasuries of great corporations upon the assumption that in their kindness and out of their ability they will increase the wages of labor.

We have at last reached a time in the discussion of the tariff when it is conceded that the tariff is a tax and that this tax is paid by the people of the country that imposes it. The tax is indirect and the amount paid by each individual is never considered by him when he goes to purchase his goods, and if he thinks of it at all he never knows how much he is paying. But the average tax on all goods imported into the United States is something more than 40 per cent; and this additional tax, collected in the first instance by customhouses when the goods are brought into the country, is added to the cost of the goods and on the tax as well, when he sells to the wholesale merchant, and the wholesale merchant adds his profit on the original cost of the goods and on the tax as well, when he sells to the wholesale merchant, and the wholesale merchant adds his profit on the retailer as when collected at the customhouse, it becomes a great deal more before it reaches the consumer.

HOW THE PEOPLE ARE DECEIVED.

How the people are dear more defore it reaches the consumer.

How the people are decreved.

The tax on sugar has been used by Prof. Taussig as an apt and easy illustration of the operation of the tariff. The duty on sugar now amounts to about 1½ cents per pound on that imported to the United States. The Treasury gets out of this tax $50,000,000, but on the sugar produced in the United States the Treasury does not get a single cent, but $60,000,000 goes into the pockets of the producers or manufacturers of sugar, making a total of $110,000,000 paid by the American people on the single item of sugar in the course of a year, or at the rate of $7.25 for each family. In order to make it clear to us all exactly how this works, Prof. Taussig suggests that instead of the Government collecting tax at customhouses, we assume that it collects the tax through the retail grocers. On this assumption, when you buy 14 pounds of sugar for $1.02, the grocer would inform you that his charge was 80 cents, but that when you had paid this 80 cents there were some other items that must be paid before you could get your 14 pounds of sugar. Thereupon you would pay 10 cents to the grocer for the use of the United States Government with which to help run the Government, in paying salaries and pensions, in building battleships, in maintaining the Army, and other expenses of the Government, and having paid this 10 cents to the Government you would thereupon be called upon for 12 cents more for the use of the sugar producers.

If this were the method actually in force for the collection of the tariff taxes, there never would be another tax levied for the sake of protection, and no Congressman would ever yote for any tariff tax except from the direst need of the Government, and he would always be able to show to his constituents that every dollar of it was needed by the Government when administered in the most economical fashion. If a tax be lidden from observation by being withdrawn from attention, and when called to mind is covered with th whole subject of tariff taxation.

IMMORALITY AND INEQUALITY OF PROTECTION.

This reexamination of the subject of tariff taxation is to-day being had. On one side we find the National Democratic Party declaring that the tariff should be levied for revenue only with which to run the Government, economically administered, while the Republicans, growing bolder as the years go on, have now put into their platform a declaration which they have never dared to put there before; that is, that the tariff should be so levied as to cover the difference in the cost of production in the United States and abroad, with a reasonable profit to the manufacturer.

The coming campaign for the Presidency is to be fought out along the line marked by these two conflicting platforms. To be sure, some men who believe in a tariff for revenue only will vote the Republican ticket and some men who believe in a tariff for protection will vote the Democratic ticket, but in the main, the great body of the people voting the one ticket or the other will east their votes in accordance with their convictions on this subject of taxation. On which side shall you and I vote, and why? For my part I shall vote the Democratic ticket, because I believe in a tariff levied for revenue only and do not believe in a tariff levied for the sake of protection.

I know, or think that I know, that all taxation, save the income tax alone, however levied and for whatever purpose, in its nature tends to monopoly, and this tendency to monopoly becomes greater the higher the tax. And I know that all taxes, save the income tax alone, are in the ultimate paid by the men who do the labor. It must be dug out of the ground. It must be hammered into houses. It must be sweated out in the mines. For taxation can not be raised out of idleness and is ever a burden upon industry. The men who work pay the taxes, and the men who idle eat them. You may tax some people rich by creating a monopoly by reason of taxation, but you can not tax all the people rich. You may create monopoly

HOW PROTECTION BREEDS TRUSTS.

Taxation may be used, as it has been used, in such fashion as to change wealth from one to another, enriching some while impoverishing others, and this is particularly the case with tariff taxation, for tariff taxation is a tax upon consumption and all the people are consumers, and they are consumers not in proportion to their ability to buy, but in proportion to their necessities. I am necessitated to eat and wear more as much as John D. Rockefeller, and if he does eat and wear more than I, it is because of his desire and from no necessity. If he lives on what I am compelled to live on, he pays no more tax toward running the United States Government than I pay, and the tax which would be a burden to me and lessen my ability for service is no burden to him,

But by keeping other people out of business for the want of adequate capital he makes stronger his grip and monopoly over his own business. The first effect of the tariff tax is to increase the price of all articles upon which it is levied, and those who produce the taxed articles in the country get the benefit of this tax in their ability to sell their productions at a higher price. This higher price means for them success; in many instances it means enormous wealth; it means tremendous fortunes. But as the people see those who are in the profected industry prosper, others turn to this industry and begin business and make money at it, swift and sure and fast, and others in turn do the same until the business is crowded and overdone, and production—which has been made at a greater cost than in foreign countries by reason of the higher cost of everything that enters into it—has become excessive and can not be consumed in the home market. And then the process of elimination sets in, the strong taking hold of the weakest, and the strong taking hold of the weakest, and the strong taking hold of the weakest, and the strong taking hold of the weakest, only the strong taking hold of the weakest, only, created, fostered, made an absolute fact by the tariff law, and with this monopoly comes the inevitable raise in prices, higher and higher and higher until they have set the whole country to wondering what is the cause of the high price of living and why is it that American manufacturers are selling abroad cheaper than they are at home; for that they do sell abroad cheaper than in America is no longer disputed. The farmer can buy his agricultural implements, the mechanic his tools, the manufacturer his machinery, the railroad builder his locomotives, the woman her sewing machine, all cheaper abroad than they can at home, and this when all the goods are made in America.

PROTECTION A SOURCE OF CORRUPTION AND MORAL CONTAGION.

woman her sewing machine, all cheaper abroad than they can at home, and this when all the goods are made in America.

PROTECTION A SOURCE OF CORRUPTION AND MORAL CONTAGION.

Not only does the tariff tax have the effect of increasing the cost of living, and concentrating wealth in the hands of the few, but it corrupts the entire body politic and makes the tariff issue a moral question which the American people must face and face now if they propose to save for their children the vital principles of equity and righteous-ness handed down to them by their forcfathers. If it be conceded to be the duty of government to make up to manufacturers the difference between cost of production in this country and in foreign countries, and also guarantee to them a reasonable profit, then our Senators and Representatives in Congress become the agents of the people for carrying out this purpose. They hold in their hands the wealth or the poverty, the success or the failure of these protected industries, and the protected industries have a right to and do look to them to safeguard their interests. The beneficiaries of this theory come to look upon government and their representatives, responsible to them and not to the people for legislation. To this end they do not hesitate to lay before the Congress their selfish views, their special and particular interests, and to enforce these views and interests with subtle argument and convincing figures, and to back up the arguments and figures with threats of nonsupport if the Representatives in Congress do not yield to such demands; and whenever they find these Representatives amenable to their arguments, figures, and threats, they naturally feel toward these Representatives a sense of gratitude growing out of their prosperity which makes them willing to contribute liberally to the campaign funds of such Representatives until now the conduct of congressional and senatorial elections throughout the country has become attended with such a fearful expenditure of money as to eliminate from

DEMORALIZATION WROUGHT BY GOVERNING FOR THE BENEFIT OF SPECIAL

DEMORALIZATION WROUGHT BY GOVERNING FOR THE BENEFIT OF SPECIAL INTERESTS.

In connection with this matter we should not overlook the fact that the United States Government is to-day prosecuting in equity and in law the various trusts of the United States, numbering several hundred, and step by step and day by day the courts are declaring these trusts have been organized, conducted, and administered in violation of law and in contempt of the statute passed to protect the people against them, and these findings by the courts involve a finding that cach one of the directors of these great corporations is guilty of a crime against the United States. It may be pleasing to some thoughtless Americans that our millionaires and multimillionaires are guilty of penitentiary offenses, and there may be in their hearts the hope that they will ultimately reap the fruits of their sowing, but one who is studying his country and its development with the hope of finding in it the prospect of betterment can not but feel a sense of humiliation to learn that the great captains of industry, those whom we have exploited and paraded and honored and glorified and worshiped, should, as a matter of fact, belong to the criminal classes. Rockefeller and Carnegie and Morgan and Duke and thousands of others, leading men, great financiers, known throughout the world, parading as representative Americans, envied of us, to-day occupy the position of being and belonging to the class of men who violate law and are subject to wear prison stripes. And this result is the outcome, the inevitable, certain, and unavoidable outcome, of the doctrine of protection! If the Government does owe these men a living, if it does owe them a profit, if the Senators and Representatives in Congress are under obligations to legislate for them, if they have the right to have the laws so framed as to take money out of our pockets and transfer it to theirs, is it any wonder that they, with the years, become more and more exacting and more hasty and more anxious and more precedes the violation of the law on the part of the strong. And it is this feeling which made actual thieves cut of the Sugar Trust and put them into the contemptible business of loading their balances so as to underweigh the sugar imported into this country and thereby to avoid the payment of the very tax which in some degree was levied for this trust's own benefit.

JUSTICE TO ALL, NOT SPECIAL FAVORS, IS THE LABORER'S HOPE

Trust's own benefit.

JUSTICE TO ALL, NOT SPECIAL FAVORS, IS THE LABORER'S HOPE.

Government can not make it possible for the few to make millions of dollars by the operation of its tax laws and not corrupt these few. The millions which they can make if the tax laws suit them will be used in part to secure Representatives and Senators who will pass such laws as the favorites may want, and when so used the protected magnates and the representatives of the people have both become corrupt, and, in turn, in order to shield themselves, to quiet the people, and to make their evil acts appear good, they have often subsidized the press, misled public opinion, and crucified the honest advocates of public virtue upon the cross of contempt. And all of this for all these years has been going on and has been accomplished in the name of protection to the American workingman!

I want to say here and now, and I want it remembered, that the poor men who labor, the men who have not the means of creating public opinion, of compelling Government favoritism, can never secure justice through advocacy of special privilege. Every dollar of this dishonest wealth is the result of the sweat of the laboring men of the United States, and has been appropriated by these few men by the operation of laws fastened upon the country under the false and preposterous plen that it would evenuate in justice to the needy. Favoritism is always extended to those who do not need it. Special privilege always belongs to the few, and in the nature of the case can not belong to the many. One of the old Latin poets, more than 2,000 years ago, animadverted to the fact that apples are always given to those who have orchards, and human nature has not changed from that day to this. No worker, no toller, no man who sweats out his daily bread, can ever hope to secure justice through governmental favoritism. His only hope for equality is in the everlasting cry for justice, "Equal rights to all, special privilege to none." There are among us those who seek to remedy have justice and equality by the abolition of all special privilege.".

A LIBEL UPON AMERICAN LABOR.

The Republican Party has always insisted that the protective tariff is essential in order to equalize wages paid in the United States with those paid elsewhere. This assumption is based upon the idea that the American workingman is not only paid more per day than the foreign workingman, but that he is paid more per output; that is to say, that he is less efficient in proportion to his wages than his foreign competitor. I deny the truthfulness of this assumption, and I stand here as the friend and champion of American labor to assert that high wages of American workingmen as compared with the wages of foreigners are not due to favoritism shown by the American Government to employees and to American workingmen, but are the direct result and outcome of our labor's greater efficiency. The American workingman is paid more per day than the foreigner, but his product, day by day and man for man, more than compensates his employer for the difference in wages. This is not only true as a historical fact, but it is true from the pure reason of the thing. All wages have to be paid in the last analysis out of production, and high wages can not be paid out of a small production for any length of time without the utter destruction of the business in which it earns, but in order to be continually employed it must produce a profit to the employers over and above the earned wage, and the higher paid American laborer does produce this profit for his employer over and above any wage paid to him, and if he did not the employer over and above any wage paid to him, and if he did not the employer over and above any wage paid to him, and if he did not the employer over and above any wage paid to him, and if he did not the employer over and above the earned wage, and the higher paid American laborer does produce this profit for his employer over and above any wage paid to him, and if he did not the employer that the difficiency. Higher

To say that the American workingman produces less in proportion to his wage than the foreigner is an outrageous assault upon his capacity, his fitness, his training, and it is not the truth. It has been invented by the Republican Party in order to hide behind the pretense of kindliness toward the workingman, and from this hidden and cowardly retreat to levy blackmail upon every consumer. The American workingman asks no favor. He insists upon no special privilege, but given a legal opportunity and a fair chance in life he will work out his own destiny and thank no man for charity or patronage. For my part, I am tired of the assumption of the prefected industries in the United States that they are eleemosynary institutions created by the Government for the purpose of collecting from unwilling consumers tribute to be paid by them to workingman is as efficiently as it is done elsewhere. If the workingman is as efficiently as it is done elsewhere. If the workingman is as efficient as elsewhere and more efficient, then he earns his higher wage and is entitled to it as a matter of right, and owes no obligation to any protected industry or to the Government of the United States for the blessings which come out of his skill and efficiency.

I want to see the Industries of North Carolina developed. I want to see them multiplied in number. I want to see competition among employers for labor, and I want to see labor trained, educated, developed, made more efficient; and with increased efficiency I want to see increased wages; and, above all, I want to see every man feeling himself a free and independent citizen, owning his own soul, and realizing that he is carning his bread by the sweat of his brow, and is not thankful to anyone for alleged favors done in his behalf. Let us break off the fetters of commerce and give her a free opportunity to grow; let us be done with the foolishness of Republican apprehension that with lower tariff taxes our country will be flooded with cheap foreign goods. The very moment that our imports increase our exports will increase. If more goods are brought into the country, they will be paid for by more goods shipped out of the country. If we are flooded with foreign goods, we will flood foreign countries with our goods.

THE SOLUTION OF THE SOUTH'S COTTON PROBLEM.

with foreign goods, we will flood foreign countries with our goods.

THE SOLUTION OF THE SOUTH'S COTTON PROBLEM.

I have read during the past fall and winter the appeals of southern governors, the chambers of commerce, of agricultural societies and farmers' unions, of bankers and business men, urging farmers of the South to lessen the production of cotton; and side by side with these appeals I have read in the papers of the terrible suffering of men throughout the world for the want of adequate clothing. I have known and all of us have known, despite our increased production of cotton, that the world is not yet adequately clad. Thousands of people die annually for want of the very raiment to be made out of cotton, the production of which we are seeking to lessen. I have realized that we must indeed lessen our production of cotton or impoverish ourselves in cultivation under existing conditions, and this has brought me to the knowledge that these conditions are wrong, for God has given to each of us the instinct to make two bales of cotton grow where one grew before, and we are educating our farmer boys with this aim in view, that they shall produce more and more each year than their fathers produced before them. But how can they work out this God-given instinct and how shall our teaching be other than a failure if we shut our cotton within the borders of the United States by building up a tariff wall against the products of other countries? Foreign trade is but an exchange of products, and is not and can not be paid for in gold. The cotton crop alone would take for its purchase all the gold in the world in a very few years. No, my countrymen; let us cease this folly. Let us break down these high walls of protection, bull around us for the sake of monopoly. Let us turn in the foreign goods of which our Republican brethren are so much afraid. Then we will see a demand for high prices and for more cotton than you can possibly produce, and the God-planted instinct of every man to create more and more will find its but I deny the sense, the morality, of continuing the conditions which have forced this necessity upon us.

A TARIFF PLATFORM.

I conclude my observations on the tariff with the succinct statement of my view as to how the matter should be dealt with:

1. I am in favor of a tariff for revenue only.

2. Such tariff to be levied—

(a) On luxurics.

(b) On comforts.

(c) And only as a last resort on necessaries.

3. Such tariff to bear equally upon all productive energy, whether engaged in agriculture, mining, or manufacturing.

4. Such tariff to bear equally upon every section of the country. And under this head I would observe that I do not believe in protection for New England and free trade for North Carolina, but a tariff for revenue only, applicable alike to both sections. I would not be guity of the quixotic folly of compelling my own people to bear an unequal proportion of the burdens of the maintenance of Government, nor would I, on the other hand, exact one cent of tribute from any other section of the country in order that my own State and the South, which I love with my whole heart, should prosper at the expense of others.

5. I agree with Gov. Woodrow Wilson that we are to act upon the general principle of the Democratic Party—not free trade, but tariff for revenue—and we must approach that by such avenues, such steps, and at such a pace as will be consistent with the stability and safety of the business of the country. And I agree with him again when he says: "The tariff is the one central issue of the coming campaigm. It is at the head of every other economic question we have to deal with, and until we have adjusted that properly we can settle nothing in a way that will be lasting and satisfactory." Similarly, Gov. Judson Harmon has well said, "The tariff is the dominating issue before the American people of so vast importance."

For this reason I would not creat division in the Democratic Party upon questions like the initiative, referendum, and recall, valuable as these agents are regarded by so ma

WHY MONOPOLIES MUST BE BROKEN UP.

WHY MONOPOLIES MUST BE BROKEN UP.

While I am on the subject of trusts and monopoly, let me say that there are many men as earnestly desirous as we are of correcting the inequalities and injustices of life, and of breaking down the instrumentalities which have brought about these inequalities and injustices, who honestly believe that the trust is a public benefit and needs only to be restrained by law and made to conform to the necessities of the public and not destroyed. They have arrived at this conclusion by reason of the very general feeling that great establishments are more efficient and can produce more economically than small ones and are therefore capable of paying higher prices for raw material at a less cost. This belief has been so general and so strong that it has given the American people pause in dealing with this question. If it were true, as is generally believed, that efficiency and therefore economy of production is attained by volume of business, there would be much ground for hesitancy about the destruction of the trusts. But fortunately at this juncture Mr. Brandels, of Boston, in his evidence before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, has demonstrated beyond all peradventure that at this very point the trust falls instead of succeeds. The highest efficiency of production and the greatest economy attainable are to be found not in the gigantic plants, but in the reasonably small ones. Efficiency is due to the cooperation of every man engaged in the production, and this cooperation is largely dependent upon the esprit de corps which is developed, so that each worker in his department is necessary to every worker in every other department, and when the heads of these departments are in direct contact with all the men, and when each man feels that the business is his own. When the business grows beyond this point and the men become units instead of individuals and are counted by numbers instead of by names, inefficiency creeps in and expenses increase in the various departments. The only way to secure the highest efficiency and the greatest economy is by a large number of plants under separate and independent conduct, each one striving to the utmost limit with the power of every individual in its employment to outdo the others.

TRUST PRODUCTION IS UNECONOMIC.

This fact when laid before the public is so patent and can be shown to be true by so many illustrations, that it is wonderful it should not have been known before. Senator CLAPP, who has given much study to this subject, in a recent interview in the Saturday Evening Post, elaborates this view and illustrates it with a power of expression well worth the attention of every thoughtful man. The trusts and monopolies of the country therefore are not to be regulated, but are to be divided into their constituent parts and compelled to remain separate and competitive forces in the economic world before we can attain to the highest development. With the destruction of the trusts and the upbuilding of numbers of smaller corporations, the demand for raw material will be increased, the efficiency of the workers multiplied, and the selling price of goods reduced. Instead of the few great controlling, dominating, overwhelming manufacturing plants, we shall have a great number of separate, independent, active, live, competing organizations, and with the coming of this day the old-fashioned loyalty, which was the charm of service in the former days, will be restored.

This is not only true theoretically, but our past experience has proved it to be true. The great trusts are not selling their products as cheap as they were sold by the independent organizations which the trusts have succeeded, and the trusts are not producing the products either as cheaply or making them as good as they were before. This fact can be demonstrated by a simple exchange of dollars across the counter of your retailer for the goods he will deliver to you, and then comparing them with what you would have paid for the same quality of goods before the advent of the trusts. So I conclude on this subject that the trusts are not to be regulated, but destroyed and supplanted by the old-time organization, willing to fight, to work, to struggle, to invent, to discover, and to intitate, willing and able to compete and actually competing for the business of the

INCOME TAX FAVORED.

Again, I am in favor of an income fax. One of the great curses of this hour is the extravagance of the National Government. Extravagance is like a contagious disease—it spreads outward from the source of infection. As the Government is, so are the people. A wasteful, reckless, and extravagant government always creates a wasteful, reckless, and extravagant people. This Government of ours has become the most extravagant upon earth. It has more than doubled its own expenditures since the administration of Grover Cleveland. The percapita expenditures have gone up from about $7 to about $12. It now costs about $60 per household to run the United States Government. No scheme is too wild, no expenditure too great, to rally around it the support of the United States Congress. The taxes collected are indirect, the people taking no note as they pay them of the fact of payment or of the amount, and since the great bulk of these taxes come out of the multitude and a very little of them come out of the few who have vast wealth, those who have the wealth have less loss in the amount of taxes which they pay than they have profit in the expenditures of the Government. The rich, therefore, are on the side of extravagance. They do not care how much the Government spends. They are always in favor of more offices and higher salaries. You can rely upon them confidently to advocate every new scheme of the Government and to insist upon the rightfulness of every national enterprise leading to larger expenditures. They know that their part in the burden is small, and their opportunity of gaining other wealth by reason of the tax laws is great, and the rich and strong are always closer to government than the poor and weak. The laborers on the farm, the worker in the factory, the mechanic in his shop, the clerk in the store, the workers in the banks, do not go to Washington. Their acqualntance with Senators and Congressmen is limited. Their influence, if unified, might be great, but they are never unified; they are too busy with their ow

How the income have the recommendation of the surface and this will always be true until the rich are made to bear their part of the burden of increased expenditures. Wherever we shall have passed and put into operation an income fax taking from those of large incomes a reasonable sum for the expenditures of the Government, the rich will then become burden bearers for the Government, and at the same instant, they will become intense, active, effective advocates of economy. They can compel economy, and whenever they realize that extravagance is to be met by an increase in their income tax, they will compel it. The simplest and most direct way to make a rich man an advocate of economy in government is to make him feel that extravagance costs him some money, and when he realizes this you will hear from him, through the press, in magazines, and in books. You will hear him deprecating not only the high cost of living, but the cost of high living. He will be clamoring for a return to the ways of the fathers. He will be insistent for economy—and his voice is so potent that it will be heard throughout the Nation.

I am in favor of an income tax, not only for the reasons just set out, but for the further reason that the tarliff tax and, indeed, our internal-revenue taxes, are taxes upon consumption and therefore fall unequally upon the rich and the poor, bearing most heavily upon the poor. As a compensation for this inequality I would have an income tax reaching HOW THE INCOME TAX WILL PROMOTE ECONOMY AND JUSTICE.

the rich alone, and thereby shift to their shoulders some of the weight that for all these years has borne so mercilessly upon the shoulders of those least able to bear it.

UNFAIR FREIGHT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NORTH CAROLINA.

UNFAIR FREIGHT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NORTH CAROLINA.

While on the subject of equality it is certainly appropriate that I should make some mention of the gross injustice done by the interstate commerce railroads in their freight rates to and from North Carolina. The difference between the rates to cities in Virginia and cities in North Carolina is so gross and outrageous as to challenge the attention and arouse the indignation of every fair-minded man to whom they are represented, and we can never change these conditions by seeking favors. We are too few in numbers and too poor in commerce ever to hope that we shall gain the grace and good will of the interstate railroads. The only ground upon which we can hope for a redress of our grievances is upon the everlasting insistence of the justice of our cause. We should perpetually assault this outrageous inequality and never cease to demand rightful treatment until our clamor shall have aroused a recognition in the Nation which will compel justice. A small population and a small commerce can never hope to prevail with the intrenched power and unfairness of the railroads and of the cities benefited by their injustice, but even small numbers and a small commerce can by insistence upon justice add to their weakness the power of the God who declared that He is no respector of persons, and in this combination there can be no defeat. I promise the people of North Carolina if elected to the United States Senate—and I believe I shall be—to spend so much of my time as may be necessary during the six years of my incumbency of office in bringing about a change in this condition, either by seeing that the law as it stands is enforced, or if the law is inadequate, by securing the enactment of one which will compel for us the righteousness to which we are entitled and of which we have been denied through all these years.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE,

I am in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people, and when I say by the people I mean by the people and not by money, not by organization, not by machinery. In a recent issue of the Charlotte Observer the editor declared that in the coming senatorial contest, while my fitness for the place was acknowledged and the love of the people for me recognized, I could not be elected for the reason that I am without money, without organization, and without machinery. This prediction, when it first appeared, startled and frightened many of my friends. It had no such effect upon me. I did not want to be elected to the United States Senate by money, by machinery, and by organization. If I were elected by these means, I should glorify and honor the means which elected me. My father taught me that the rungs of the ladder on which I rise should be honored by me. If I rise on the rungs of wealth, organization, and machinery, I know myself well enough to realize that I should count my obligation in the Senate to these things. But if I go to the Senate as the untrammeled choice of the people of North Carolina, to them I shall owe the honor and to them shall be dedicated all the service of my heart and mind and body, under God, to the perfection of our Government and to the betterment of the conditions of mankind.

The Charlotte Observer is mistaken. It may be true in some of the Northern and Western States that a man must be rich before he can go to the Senate. It may be true in Pennsylvania that he can not go without the assent of the machine. It may be true in New York that organization is essential to the success of any candidate for office. But in North Carolina the people, who have been clamoring for the right to ledet their own Senators, will not dishonor their own demand by suffering an election to turn upon false and corrupting things.

THE MENACE OF MONEY IN POLITICS.

THE MENACE OF MONEY IN POLITICS.

Apart from any personal interest which I feel in this matter, I want to say to all North Carolinians that the test of the benefit of popular election of United States Senators is to be found in the power of the people to select their own Senators without cost and without dictation from machinery or organization. I regard this as of so great moment that I now deliberately declare that not only shall I not use money in this campaign beyond the very limited sum necessary, but I do not want my friends to use money in my behalf. I expect them to give their time and service to the proper presentation of my candidacy to the people, a task which I have always gladly rendered to those whom I supported as freely as I breathed the air. It will be an evil day for this good State of ours when the prediction of the Charlotte Observer shall have become the history of the State. The great curse of this hour is the mad scramble after wealth, corrupting, destroying, undermining the morals of the country, and if to the things which wealth can purchase shall be added the honors which the people alone ought to bestow, the scramble after wealth will become a carrival of crime. A recent writer has truly said: "Historians know that the critical hour for every Carthage and Ephesus, every Athens and Rome, every Berlin and Parls, every London and New York, comes when avarice of money and business interests select the legislatures that make laws, the judges who interpret laws, and the rulers who execute laws, conceived in selfishness and interpreted by cupidity. The decline of every nation and every city has begun with avarice and commercial interests administering the government for the powerful and avariclous few."

Yes, I am without power and without wealth, without organization and without machinery, but I am not poor and I am not helpless. I am rich in the love of North Carolinians and strong in their belief that it is my purpose now, as it ever has been in the past, to serve them as a whole without

GOV. AYCOCK'S POLITICAL RECORD.

And now, ladies and gentlemen, I am about to do what I have never done before. I am about to announce in a public speech my candidacy for an office before my party has chosen me as its standard bearer. I have hesitated long before deciding to do this thing. It was my purpose not to enter this campaign at all, so far as the presentation of my candidacy was concerned, but the constant assertion on the part of the advocates of other candidates that I was not in the race, that I had entered it for ulterior purposes, has made in incumbent upon me in justice to my own character and in fairness to the men who are supporting me, to announce in a public speech that I am a candidate for the United States Senate, and expect to remain one until chosen or defeated by the untrammeled will of the Democratic voters of North Carolina.

I have given more than a quarter of a century of the best years of my life and my hardest work to the service of the Democratic Party in this State. I have confined my labors almost exclusively in that behalf to this State because it is the State of my birth and in her soil my body will rest when I shall have crossed over the river, and I love her beyond any part of this great American Union. I have not always served her wisely, but I can look the entire body of her people in the face to-night and I can declare that I have ever served her zealously and with no thought of the possible effect of my course upon my own career. I have held her highest office, and under God I assert to-night that I never said a word or did a deed during the entire four years of my term of office with any view to my personal aggrandizement. I never sought to build up a personal or factional machine, and I never endeavored to tie men to me by any sense of obligation by reason of favors done by me for them, for I did no man any favor as governor, but I earnestly sought to do every man the right of equal and exact justice.

but I earnestly sought to do every man the right of equal and exact justice.

If the people believe this of me and want me to serve them further, I shall be glad. If they think that either of my opponents is wiser, better, or more loyal to their interests, I shall bow with humility to their registered will and come out of the contest rejoicing in the hope that government will be wiser, more economical, and more in favor of the many than it has ever been heretofore, and anxious still, as I always have been, to do my little part, whether in public or private station, for the advancement of the cause of liberty upon the earth and the upbuilding of the Kingdom of God.

A THRUSTE TO HIS OPPONENTS.

the many than it has ever been heretofore, and anxious still, as I always have been, to do my little part, whether in public or private station, for the advancement of the cause of liberty upon the earth and the upbullding of the Kingdom of God.

If any of you have come here to night expecting me to say aught against the other candidates, you must leave unsatisfied. I can not do it. For more than 30 years I have been hattling in behalf of Democracy against Republicanism. I have been in the midst of the conflict; sometimes in the lead, more often as a private soldier, but always with my guns trained upon the common enemy and not inflicting wounds upon those of the household of faiti. If I were to attempt to assail Senator SimMoxs, my memory would awaken and I should recall the sitring days of 1898 and 1900, when, as the captain of the mighty hosts of Democracy, he led us to single, convincing, and final victory. Should I attempt to say aught against Gov. Kitchin, my mind would at once revert to the dark days of 1800 when he dashed his maiden sword in to Washington the lone Democracit Congressman. Winning his great victory over the theretofore invincible Thomas Settle. If I should seek to assail Chief Justice Clark, I could but recall the many years of his eminent service on the bench, and I could but reflect that during all these years I have been steadily vofing for him and proclaiming to the people of North Carolina that he was in every way fit for the highest judicial office in this State. These are the things which I shall be called upon to say of them again, if in the wisdom of Democracy they are chosen for office again. I can not bring myself in my own personal sout of harmony with what I have heretofore said and what I stand ready to say once more. That I do not agree with them in all things is certain. That I would have acted differently in their places on many occasions I am confident. But that they are Democrats and worthy men I shall not aftempt to gainasy. We are about to enter upon the most tremendo

THE THINGS IN WHICH NORTH CAROLINA IS MAKING PROGRESS.

THE THINGS IN WHICH NORTH CAROLINA IS MAKING PROGRESS.

We have indeed gone far in North Carolina. A recent writer has declared that the progress of a State may be determined by the things which are now done as a matter of course which used to be the subject of debate. Tested by this standard, North Carolina has advanced rapidly under Democratic rule. The right of every child to a public school education is no longer a subject of controversy but is acknowledged by everyone. The duty and wisdom of adequate, excellent public roads is not only acknowledged by everybody, but has recently been emphasized by the mud through which we have slowly dragged ourselves to the markets of the State. The right of children to be safeguarded in the time of their growth and development against overwork in factories is a right which no one now disputes. The duty of caring for the afflicted, whether due to age or infirmity, has been translated into so beautiful an application and has been performed with such steadfastness as to render one who would now deny it contemptible in the sight of all the people. The holy obligation of unstopping the ears of the deaf and making the blind to see, of making easy for the old soldlers and their widows their descent on the other side of the hill that leads to the everflowing river, has become the common heritage of us all. The paramount object of the State to obtain peace and quiet and good order to the end that men may quietly work out their own destinies has been rendered emphatic by performance. And no more does anyone, whatever may be his view about the efficacy of prohibition, ever expect to see again the dominance of the barroom and whisky still in the civic and political life of this great State of ours.

AYCOCK'S FAREWELL TO HIS PEOPLE.

We stand a-tiptee on the misty mountain height and see the morning sun make purple the glories of the east. We are entering upon a new day, the day of equality of opportunity, the hour when every man shall be free to work mightily for himself until his soul, filled to satisfaction, shall overflow with a common benefit to mankind, owing no tribute to anyone and bound only to love his fellow man and serve his God as to him may seem best.

"May these things be;"
Sighing she spoke;
"I fear they will not,
Dear, but let us type them now
In our own lives, and this proud watchword rest,
Of equal."

Equal! That is the word. On that word I plant myself and my party—the equal right of every child born on earth to have the opportunity "to burgeon out all that there is within him."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 21478) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sailors, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Sam Smallpage, late of Company D, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, Oregon and Washington Territory Indian War, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

is now receiving.

The above bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 194, Andrew N. Shuttleworth, H. R. 488, John Moore, H. R. 607, Walter Cox, H. R. 4954, John S. Edmonds, H. R. 12236, William W. Barber, H. R. 12240. Wright W. Patrick. H. R. 12560. John Johnson H. R. 14187. Benjamin J. Oswald. H. R. 17532. Sam Smallpage.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded?
Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia to 20 minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in connection with this bill that it carries with it the sum of $1,152, as follows: Three Spanish War soldiers, three Regular Army soldiers, and three Indian war survivors. That is the amount the bill carries. If the gentleman from Georgia desires to make any inquiry about any of the cases referred to, I will be very glad to give him the information.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if this is not one of the bills the nature and character of which is particularly provided for in the rules to be taken up and considered as in order on two Fridays in the month known as pension Fridays?

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is a motion made to suspend the rules, as the gentleman understands, and it is in order under my motion for the House to pass this bill. I do not see any occasion for my answering the inquiry further and entering into unnecessary particulars. I quote for the gentleman's benefit the rule under which I made the motion, as follows:

Par. 4. Rule XXVII. After the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall have been called on any Monday, and motions to suspend the rules have been disposed of, it shall be in order to call up any such motion which shall have been entered at least seven days prior thereto.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Until just now these bills and bills similar in character have not been considered under suspension of the rules, however, but have been considered on pension Friday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be true, but what objection has the gentleman to considering them now?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I was merely asking the question.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I say that may be true.
Mr. RODDENBERY. I would like to inquire, further, if there is any particular reason why instead of considering this class of bills on pension Friday, under the rule, it is necessary in the gentleman's judgment to discontinue taking them up on that day and consider them under motion to suspend the rules? Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman ask my judgment on the question?

Mr. RODDENBERY, No. Is there any statement the gentleman desires to make about it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to take them up in the manner we are now proposing to take them up. I do not want to go into an elaborate statement of my reasons for that, but I believe it is necessary in order to get bills properly passed which are deserving in every respect, so much so that we ought to resort to the motion which I have made to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Then, in response to the gentleman's suggestion. I desire to call attention to the fact that in the committee report, on page 4, near the bottom, we find the case of Walter Cox, of Portalo, Cal., showing applications from time to time made by this proposed pensioner through the bureau for a pension under the general statute. Your report reciting that the Pension Department did not find that he was entitled to a pension resulting from service, and finally the committee concludes that the injury was received in service in line of duty. Does this report show all the evidence upon which the committee reached the conclusion that the Pension Commissioner was in error in his decision and that the committee was right?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In my judgment, the report does show that.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The report contains—
Mr. RICHARDSON. Substantially the facts upon which the committee acted.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of time; I was asking the gentleman questions out of his time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman had taken his seat and relinquished his right to the floor. The gentleman from Georgia. Does the gentleman from Alabama reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do. Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire in the time allowed under suspension of the rules to discuss the Spanish-American War pension system a little. I desire to preface that statement with a little matter of history. Until this time so far as I can find in the Congressional Record relating to the consideration of private pension bills for the Spanish-American War, the Philippine skirmish, and so forth, that it has not been the practice to move to suspend the rules and move to pass the bills without consideration. Under existing parliamentary law adopted by this House private pension legislation is preferred above all other legislation twice a month. These are called "Pension Fridays." Private pension bills are given the right of way. The Pension Committee can bring them in and consider and pass them, but now the Pensions Committee has seen proper to let that rule become obsolete. They do not use or employ that rule in the consideration of private pension legislation. There is nothing in the Record of recent date showing any necessity, any reason why the Democratic majority should abandon Rule 870 and on another day, given over ordinarily to other business, move to suspend the rules and pass these bills. To do that is, in effect, to say that no Member has a right to move to amend a bill; to do that is, in effect, to say that, no matter how unjust, how erroneous, or how obnoxious any bill may be, the House is powerless to strike that item from the bill. To resort to motion to suspend the rules and desert the established rule of procedure for the consideration of private pension bills is, in effect, to say that no Member has a right to discuss, paragraph by paragraph, the items of the bill and move to strike them out or move to amend a single one of them. This motion to suspend the rules denies to any Member of the House the right to move to recommit a bill for perfection, for amendment, or for any action. Not only that but it limits the entire discussion on one of these omnibus bills to 40 minutes-20 minutes to a side.

What justification is there, what precedents, what record, or what conduct appears that has interrupted the procedure for the passage of private pension bills for the Spanish War which justifies the resort of a Democratic House to a suspension of the rules to pass those bills? The history of parliamentary legislation shows that for 100 years there is no precedent for it under any party's administration. The Republican Party, in all their yearnings and in all their recklessness with pension legislation, has never done it. The Democratic Party, in its former days of power has never done it. I present, Mr. Speaker, to Members of the House and to the committee frankly and in seriousness, Is the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill a normal and ordinary procedure? This is our Rule 870. I will read part of it:

On Friday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order: On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of described. desertion.

Now, here is an express rule of the House providing for the consideration of these bills and of this very bill. That rule opens up a bill to general debate for an hour or more. extraordinary motion now invoked cuts it off to 40 minutes. This rule I have read opens up the bill to amendment; your motion now shuts off amendment. This rule which I read allows discussion of each item in the bill under the five-minute rule, gives the right to inquire, to investigate, to strike out, to

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I should prefer not to yield. The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If I had physical strength, I should be glad to do so. The rule I have read permits a motion to recommit the bill; the rule you invoke denies that right.

This is a Democratic House and a Democratic majority. What reason does this Democratic House and this Democratic majority give for undertaking to pass this bill under a motion to suspend the rules? The record of our party is against this procedure in any legislation except where the exigencies of the case require it. What are the exigencies of the case now? Take this session of Congress, and the various Spanish-American War private bills, search the records, and where has any delay, where has any interposition, where has any undue discussion been indulged to justify this course of action? Does the gentleman propose to bring the Spanish War private bills in under motions to suspend the rules because there have been some liberal discussions on private pension bills from another committee? If so, why? I submit that the Democratic majority in resorting to this procedure is going back on its professions to the people in past campaigns that we were in favor of fair discussion and of the right of open debate; that we were opposed to gag rule; we were opposed to "Cannonism"; that we were opposed to turning the House into a tyranny; and that we were in favor of Members fairly and publicly considering all proposed legislation. If there is any good reason for it now, presume gentlemen in their time will give it.

I desire to advert to another subject. I hold here a letter from the National Headquarters, United Spanish War Veterans, 35 Nassau Street, Room 1003, New York City. It is a polite and a proper letter, addressed to all the Members of the House, under date of March 19, 1912. I shall place the entire letter in the RECORD, lest by the few lines I discuss the author or some other gentleman might think that the discussion that we indulge upon it is not fair in the light of the entire letter. Our discussion will be no criticism of the letter, its propriety, or of the gentleman who transmits it to us. I will only read extracts from it.

This communication is addressed to us on behalf of the honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the United States forces during the War with Spain, the incidental insurrection in the Philippine Islands, and the Boxer campaign in China. Approximately 400,000 men followed the colors in the said warfares, the letter alleges.

This letter touches a bill that proposes to extend special pensions to dependents of these soldiers. In the course of time, we will say, widows and children will add 100,000 more. So we have an organization that now comes to Congress and recites to us that 400,000 American citizens were engaged in these divers warfares—the bare scrimmage of the Spanish and Philippine War. What does it portend for the future? When we begin with this private pension legislation plus the general statute for pensions to the Spanish-American soldiers, we as Members of Congress stand face to face with the proposition that these men, now in the prime of their manhood, through this organization are building the foundation for a system of pensions that has for its future operation constant preying upon the Treasury by 400,000 men and 100,000 widows and children.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will yield.

Mr. DYER. Does the letter the gentleman refers to make reference to pensions for these 400,000 men?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not at all. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. This deals only with pensions for the widows. But the gentleman knows that there are pensions now provided for Spanish War soldiers. The gentleman sees now every two weeks these small and moderate private pension bills that are brought in for the Spanish War soldiers. And what we are calling the attention of the House to now is that Congress sees the very beginning of another pension system that will grow, extend, and swell, and who knows or who doubts but in the future it will be liberalized, liberalized, liberalized, until hundreds of thousands of these strong men have this organization seeking pensions for them? We can not close our eyes to the future.

I read a portion of the letter that hints at it:

Under existing law but few families in the Southland are benefited, for the great bulk of Government expenditure for pensions is restricted to Union veterans, their survivors, and dependents. Our measure wipes out Mason and Dixon's line.

Thus the letter reads.

Gentlemen, that view of any legislation is abhorrent to my judgment, and conflicts with what I think is a just proposal. It requires no pension system to wipe out what is called the Mason and Dixon line. You do not have to give to the southern country any measure of patronage for rivers and harbors, for pensions, or battleships, or anything else in order to wipe out that line. It is gone and has been gone for 40 years. [Applause.] Our loyalty is an unpurchasable quality; our patriotism is above any price.

It is true that from my section these true and hardy Spanish War soldiers came, many of them, but it does not alter the proposition that no scheme of popularizing a spurious pension system should be sought to gain favor by saying that it wipes out sectional lines. Seven of the Northern States now get half of all the pensions for the Union Army; and if those pensions are right, if they are just, I should not protest against it and should raise no voice against it, even if all of it went to one State.

I do not understand that these pensions are given to Union soldiers in order to distribute money over the country, but as recognition of the services of the soldiery of this country, without regard to what States they enlisted from or what State they now reside in.

And such ought to be the view with which we approach a consideration of the Spanish War pensions. And I now call the attention of the House to it. In 30 years, in 20 years from to-day, if the present policy of private pensions goes on and increases in the same ratio that private pensions in the past have increased, and if the laws allowing pensions to the Spanish War soldiers are liberalized and extended as other pension laws have been extended, we shall see at the end of 25 years a pension roll the equal in its volume to the pension roll of to-day, and we may as well admit it now.

I submit that when these private bills are brought in here for these men, time should be had to discuss them, opportunity should be given to move amendments, and opportunity should be given to discuss them under the five-minute rule as other legislation. [Applause.]

FLOODS ON THE MISSISSIPPI AND ITS TRIBUTARIES (H. DOC. NO. 088).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith communication from the Secretary of War, in which he sets out the necessity for an additional appropriation to meet the expenses which have been incurred and are likely to be incurred by the War Department in meeting the emergency of the present floods upon the Mississippi and its tributaries.

The estimate includes an estimate of $300,000 from the Chief of Engineers, in addition to the $350,000 already appropriated, to be used for the same purpose as the original appropriation, in protecting levees against impending floods. It applies to the tributaries of the Mississippi as well as the main river, but does not include any estimate for damages already caused in districts where the crest of the flood has passed.

The Quartermaster General estimates that an expenditure of $275,000 will be required to cover the expenses which he is incurring, and will be obliged to incur, in furnishing shelter, forage for cattle and horses, transportation, etc.

The Commissary General estimates that he will require the sum of $212,879.11 to cover the expense of the rations which he is supplying, and will be obliged to supply, to the thousands of destitute persons in the flood regions.

The crest of the flood is now reaching the lower portion of the Mississippi, where the country is flatter and where the danger to the levees is at least as great as above, and where the damage and loss to persons and property, if crevasses occur, will be far greater than on the upper river, necessitating even a greater amount of relief work than that already incurred.

These estimates have been carefully made and are based on communications from officers of the Army now upon the ground superintending the relief and engineering work.

I respectfully urge upon Congress the importance of meeting this great emergency. The estimates, copies of which are transmitted herewith, have been sent regularly to the Secretary of the Treasury to be submitted to Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 15, 1912.

DENSIONS

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Murray].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Murray] is recognized.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, it is always a matter of regret in this House and out of this House for me to have to disagree with one for whom I have such pleasant feelings as I have for my colleague from Georgia [Mr. Roddenber]. But, Mr. Speaker, when I find him holding such a positive and antagonistic viewpoint on pending legislation as he has of legislation for relief of widows and orphans of deceased Spanish War veterans, I feel that it is necessary for me to rise and say that I sincerely hope the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Richardson] to suspend the rules may be adopted. I hope that the pending measure may be speedily passed and that soon, before the end of this session of Congress has arrived, we may have an opportunity to pass upon a unanimous report of the Committee on Pensions in favor of pension legislation for the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors who served in the War with Spain

I do not now wish to refer particularly to applications for pensions by survivors and widows of veterans of the Spanish-American War, but I know something from my limited experience of the difficulties one encounters in convincing the Pension Commissioner, under the provisions of the general law, as to the merits of cases. I know something, too, of the difficulties of convincing the chairman and members of the Committee on Pensions, because of their painstaking and sincere desire to see only exact justice done to the country as well as to the men who petition for pension relief; and I feel confident, because of that experience, that these measures that are to-day reported must come to us only after the most careful consideration at the hands of the men who compose that committee. [Applause.]

I know something of the men for whom I have tried to secure pension legislation in this Congress. I regret that my colleague from Georgia [Mr. Roddenbery] was not one of those 400,000 men who went forth in 1898, in order that he might to-day have something of intimate knowledge of the facts and personal association with the men involved in some of those cases. I would like to speak as I stand here of that splendid son of his own State of Georgia who was in the same company in which I was honored to be allowed to serve; a man who was a splendid speciman of physical manhood on the first day I saw him, when we held up our hands together and took the oath of allegiance to support the Constitution and to follow the flag wherever it might be carried. And we swore to serve wherever we might be sent and for so long a time as we might be needed. And then I reflect upon the terrible change that came over him as the direct result of malarial fever, contracted not only in Cuba but in some of the places in the Southland, because the conditions that prevailed in 1898, when we were there, were not nearly so pleasant as some of us have found them on occasions since that time. I wender, as I stand here, whether or not this day may bring to me the news that that comrade of mine of 1898, after a terrible struggle that has lasted now for nearly 14 years, may not have been compelled to yield up his life as a result of the terrible tuberculosis that he contracted because of that service. I cite that case as splendidly typical of many men who have had a similar experience. I remind the gentleman that this bill is not for the relief of Spanish War reterans themselves. It is for the relief of widows and orphans of men who gave their lives, either through the disaster of war, or through disease in time of peace, as a result of that service.

Mr. DYER. Right on the matter the gentleman is speaking of, the gentleman is acquainted with the letter which has been

Yes; and my colleague said he was going to incorporate it in the RECORD.

With regard to the Crago bill, I should like to have the gentleman state approximately how many widows that bill would apply to.

Mr. MURRAY. The purpose of the gentleman's question is entirely friendly, because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] served in 1898 in the Spanish War and he knows the number of widows who will be benefited by this bill is infinitesimally small in comparison with the 400,000 men who served. In the first place, it affects, of course, only those comrades of that war who have married, and many of them are still unmarried. It applies not even to all the married veterans of that war, but to those only who have died leaving widows and orphans that are dependent. It is most unselfish legislation, and I congratulate my comrades of the Spanish War that they have begun their fight for recognition by the presentation of such a satisfactory bill. I hope that the Pension Committee may report soon in favor of the bill that is criticized by my colleague, or one like it. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I see no occasion to use any more of the time allotted to me.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 22194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which will be read by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of Major C. Hungate, late of Capt. John S. Ford's company (first company), Texas Volunteers, Indian wars, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.
The name of Thomas Smith, late of Company C, Thirty-eight Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

ment United States volunteer infautry, that we had he is now receiving a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Alice Downing, widow of Bedford M. Downing, late of Company B, First Regiment District of Columbia Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, with $2 per month additional for each of three minor children of the soldier until they, respectively, reach the age of 16 years.

The name of Henry F. Mackey, late of the United States Navy, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Mary Norris Tillman, widow of James H. Tillman, deceased, late colonel First Regiment South Carolina Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of one minor child of the officer until such child reaches the age of 16 years.

The above bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Pensions:

The above bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 8580. Lucy F. Geiger. H. R. 13129. Major C. Hungate, H. R. 15222. Thomas Smith. H. R. 15514. Alice Downing H. R. 15733. Lewis G. Murray. H. R. 16637. Thomas Joyce. H. R. 17307. Harry F. Keefer. H. R. 19632. Henry F. Mackey. H. R. 19733. Mary Norris Tillman.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?
Mr. RODDENBERY. I demand a second.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Rodden-Bery] demands a second, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that this bill carries with it the aggregate sum of $1.872. It is for the benefit of certain Spanish War soldiers, six of the cases being original and one an increase, and of Indian war survivors-19 in all. As I said, the amounts aggregate $1,872.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, my remarks on the previous bill were not directed to a consideration of the merits of the Crago bill, but I specially disclaimed such intention. But the entire spirit of the letter emanating from the headquarters of the Spanish War Veterans asserts that the soldiers of the Spanish War should be put on an equal or like footing with the soldiers of the late Civil War. There is reason for calling attention to the fact that this claim is not borne out by the facts and justice of the case. Neither now, nor 5 years from now, nor 20 years from now, nor 30 years from now, should a soldier of the Spanish War necessarily be placed upon the same footing with the soldiers of the great Civil War.

Where the soldier of the Spanish War received an injury or a disability resulting from his enlistment he should stand, so far as a pension is concerned, upon the same footing, but in no other respect. The Spanish War demonstrated that the American soldier was patriotic, was brave, and would go to the defense of his country if need be. They were as courageous as the soldiers of 40 years ago. I would not detract one whit from their patriotism, their courage, or from their readiness to serve their country. There were many instances of inspiring heroism. But the other war was a different struggle covering a different period. It was a fight of brothers against brothers, the most terrific, the most titanic war of all time. It literally took the strength of both sections of the country to determine the great issue.

But here is the Spanish-American War, with scarcely a thousand men who fell in real battle. It was only a skirmish; there never was a real battle either on sea or on land. There was courage, there was valor, there was patriotism, and no doubt they would all have given up their lives if need be, but to liken it to the great war of the sixtles is like a vanishing shadow and takes a strong imagination to do it. Now, take the Crago bill, if you choose. It gives not alone to widows and dependents of soldiers whose death resulted from injuries in the war, but it provides that they shall be pensioned, without proving his death to be the result of his Army service, and it is not necessary that the soldier should have been married during the enlistment. The only requirement is that he shall have married before he was 50 years of age.

Look at a further provision. Not only the widows of dependent soldiers are the beneficiaries under this act, but it in-cludes the widows and orphans of the acting assistant surgeons, contract doctors, dentists, the veterinary surgeons, officers and enlisted men in the Revenue-Cutter Service who were temporarily in vessels or in the Army. That is the proposition. I am not discussing the bill on its merits, as if it were up for passage, but merely to point out what is the present drift of this pension proposition and to let you see now that the war, if it was a war, threatens to load upon the backs of our people pensions to the widows of the tooth doctor, the horse doctor, wagon driver, and the assistant surgeons, who never left the soil of Tennessee, who never left the domain of Georgia or other States. Now, many of these soldiers joyously encamped at Chickamauga never left the State. The only officer that I know to be drawing a pension is a colonel who fell off the wagon and sprained his rib. After they enlisted they had good rations. A good many of them died from bad water, others perished from mean rum, and a number lost their lives from eating tough beef.

But, gentlemen, I present it to you now that this bill carries pensions to widows of young men who were glad to go out to Chickamauga and other agreeable encampments with a brass band and enjoy a season of camp life. They saw country that they never would have seen but for that. They were in that they never would have seen but for that. They were in camp with good tents; they had rations served; they had martial music; and a picnic the like of which many young men in this country had never before seen and perhaps will never have again. Now, the United Spanish War Veteran Association is going to begin, not by pensioning the horse doctors, not by pensioning the tooth carpenters, not by pensioning the subaltern surgeons, but by fixing their widows, and the next thing they surgeons, but by fixing their widows, and the next thing they will be fixing the soldiers. We may as well look it square in the face. I call your attention to it now. The judgment of the country will determine 5 years, 10 years, 20 years from now whether the prophecy now made will be verified or not. If this policy is pursued, with your 40-minute gag rule and suspension debate, you can not strike out the undeserving case. These soldiers in this bill claim that they went to war; they do not claim to have fought; they do not claim to have been injured; they do not claim on battle field to have contracted disease. The record does not show it, the report does not show it; but they took the lockjaw; they took the typhoid fever; they took the bilious fever years after they left the Army in good health. They never saw a real general; never got within 1,000 miles of a gunshot; some of them never got within 2,000 miles of Cuba; some of them never toted a loaded gun except with powder and no ball for dress parade. They never left Chickamauga and other peaceful camps except to go around the country on excursions. Now we are proposing to pension them at $20 a month, at $30 a month, and so on. It is not patriotic, it is not in line with the country's duty to its soldiers.

I have no doubt that the boys who went from my town, from my county, from my district, and from my State were as ready to do battle if need be as any soldiers, but it is no wise policy now for this Government to begin to pacify a little southern sentiment by passing these Spanish War bills. It is only a scheme to pacify the pension sentiment of the country with little Spanish War pepper put on the sauce of the great Civil War pensions so that they will go down easy. Gentlemen, I will vote for one of the Civil War pension bills when it is just, not because the Spanish War soldier from my section is now recognized, but because every great Government should pension the soldiers who battle and die for it or sustain an injury by it.

But let us have none of this camp-fire business, none of this holiday picnic of 1898, none of this dress parade, none of this blue coat and brass buttons and marine bands, to lead them around under the shadow of the mountains and in the green valleys, where they had fresh Tennessee chicken and Kentucky eggs and mountain trout in abundance, with honey from the hillside and sirup from the cane patch-where they fed and fattened in the most luxurious living any young American ever had. And now they come, and dignify it with the name of war, and as soldiers want a pension. Gentlemen, it would be scandalous if it were not so ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker, this is no observation we are making against your old Federal soldiers. This is no tirade that we are making for my country against your northern soldier. This is no effort to deny to the scar-worn veteran of any war a pension, but a protest, feeble, under disadvantages and in the minority, against giving pensions now by special bills to men who enjoyed a holiday, who drew their pay at 100 cents on the dollar, with the best equipment, the best tents, the best rations, the best water, and the least sacrifice and no fighting at all.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Certainty.
Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman speak from experience as a soldier, from what he has observed, or from what somebody has told him?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I speak from as much experience of dangers as 90 per cent of these fellows in these special Spanish War bills the House is now about to pass. I have toted a gun oftener, have been in greater danger, had more sorry rations, been hungrier and more tired, and now and within the last 10 weeks have submitted to more dangerous and perilous assaults from my colleagues in the House on this pen-sion graft than 1 per cent of the Spanish soldiers ever saw or ever will. [Applause and laughter.]

It was no war. It was barely a skirmish. Why, even the President enjoyed the holiday, as did the great ex-President, the would-be President, the thrice-time candidate for President; and every politician in the country who wanted to get in line of promotion, all knowing that Spain did not have a boat that a Winchester would not sink and that the falling dynasty of Spain did not have a soldiery that a regiment of schoolboys could not put to rout. The Rough Riders rushed up San Juan Hill and then to the White House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman include Mr. William Jennings Bryan in that?

Mr. RODDENBERY. William Jennings Bryan was no less patriotic, but not quite as persevering.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Not quite successful. Mr. RODDENBERY. Not quite so successful. President not only beat Bryan to the war, but he grabbed up Bryan's political paraphernalia, all of his progressive accouterments, his ammunition, his doctrines, his bombshells and explosives, and marched up before the American people, leaving Bryan standing on Gibraltar alone, and with the acclaim of thousands was inducted into the position of Commander in Chief of all of the Armies of the United States, and we hailed him President.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RODDENBERY. Certainly. Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman seen or heard of that famous picture of the ex-President of the United States charging up San Juan Hill on a black charger, when there was not a horse within 40 miles of that battle ground?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I have not seen the picture. I do not know whether it is so or not, but that black charger brings this to my mind: If you really want to do something for these good Spanish War boys join with me and go down here to this Pension Office and take out the Africans, turn them out of their jobs, and give the places to our Spanish War soldiers, and keep them there as long as they are able to work and labor. Let them administer a Caucasian government supported by Caucasian taxpayers. When they get too old, if they are indigent, then consider pensioning them; then go down Pennsylvania Avenue to this massive War and Navy Building, walk up and down the aisles, and take those black sons of the coconut region who sit there with big brown drops of sweat coming out of their foreheads, kick them out, and put these old veterans of the Civil War there by those tables, at those telephones under those electric fans, and as long as they are able to labor let them have the benefit of the Nation's offices and gratitude. You have taken those old heroes of that great struggle and sent them out to labor and toil to pay taxes to support these Africans, for whom they offered their lives that they might be free. If you have anything to give out, go to the sons of these veterans of the Civil War and bring them from the mine, bring them from the field and shop and fill these negroes' places with them. Let not the old pioneer of this country at 90 years of age be felling a tree in the forest, where by reason of his infirmity he drops dead beneath its shock. Give him and his kind a quiet and easy position now enjoyed by a "kinky head."

Take this class of men in their infirmity and give them these do-nothing, sitting-down jobs, and turn this mixed broad of African tree climbers out to earn a living on the farms and in the fields. [Laughter.] You can fool the white people of this country no longer by putting a fellow here and there in an country no longer by putting a fellow here and there in an office and giving him a salary and telling him how he shall vote. They are tired being paid off with $50 Jobs while the African draws $100. Times are changed, and the sons of these old veterans are not going to stand for it any longer. They are not going to let their fathers go out and fight for four years to give the Ethiopian liberty and then submit to our taxing them the balance of their lives to give buck Africans jobs in all these departments around here and all over this country. So if you want to do something for the Spanish War soldier and the son of a veteran of the Civil War and the old veteran himself, fire these political signposts out. There are about 50,000 of them drawing all the way from $3,000 down to $300. Put the Anglo-Saxon in. They are honorable; they are our blood. They helped save this country, if saved it was. They have made this country and will perpetuate it. Do something for them now. Turn Africa out and let America in. This ebony-hued tribe have thousands of comfortable positions, sitting on plush-bottom chairs, with feet resting on stone tiling, with ears listening to the hum of the electric fans while pictures of our mighty men are hanging on the walls around them. Year in and year out these black-tinted Africans, emitting the compound aroma of cucumber and onion, do nothing and draw salaries, and my people and yours labor to furnish the gold to pay them with. Go down to the Bureau of Printing and Engraving where there stands a pure white girl working day by day and next to her a black negro working day by day

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. RODDENBERY. Fire them out! Fire them out! Fire them out! [Laughter.] If you have got Caucasian blood in them out! your veins kick them out. In their places establish the soldier, his sons, and his daughters, the builders and the preservers of this Republic.

The following is the letter referred to in my remarks:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS, New York City, March 19, 1912. Hon. S. A. Roddenberr, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: This communication is addressed to you on behalf of the honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the United States forces during the War with Spain, the incidental insurrection in the Philippine Islands, and the Boxer campaign in China. Approximately 400,000 men followed the colors in the said warfares. They have received scant statutory recognition from the National Government.

Speaking for my comrades, I ask your support for H. R. 17470, introduced by Hon. Thomas S. Craco, of Pennsylvania, which provides that if any member of the classes described has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow or minor children, the widow during her widowhood shall receive a monthly allowance of $12 for herself, and of $2 for each child under 16 years, the allowance being contingent on the fact that the soldier or sallor shall have married before attaining the age of 50 years. We seek to enlist your vote and, aid on the following grounds:

grounds:

1. This measure seeks no pension for the comrades, but merely for their dependent widows and orphans.

2. The Government, in grateful recognition of the services of the soldiers and sailors of all the other wars of our Republic, has enacted similar statutes in their behalf. Failure to adopt this resolution will make our comrades the subjects of an unjust and uncharitable discrimination.

3. Under existing laws but few families in the Southland are benefited, for the great bulk of governmental expenditure for pensions is distributed to Union veterans, their survivors and dependents. Our measure wipes out the Mason and Dixon line. It places the widows and orphans of the comrades of Fitzhugh Lee and Joe Wheeler on an equal footing with the dependents of those who enlisted from the Northern Status.

footing with the dependents of those who enlisted from the Northern States.

4. Inquiry at the Pension Office discloses the fact that the Crago bill will involve no heavy appropriation. The majority of our comrades are unmarried. Most of them are in the prime of young manhood. The maladies of old age have not had an opportunity to produce their fatal result. The widows and orphans to be benefited constitute, therefore, a limited class. The appropriation necessitated will be but a very small fraction of that required by the acts which grant pensions to the widows and dependents of the 2,775,000 men who served in the Federal forces in the war between the States.

For the foreging reasons we, who offered our lives for our country, asking no odds for ourselves, request that the Government, in grateful recognition, extend its protecting hand to our widows and orphans when we are gone.

we are gone.

Will you favor me with an acknowledgment of this letter, expressing your views? Respectfully, yours,

MAURICE SIMMONS, Commander in Chief.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Austin].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I can not sit quietly here and listen to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia with reference to the services of the men who enlisted and served during the Spanish-American War. The great body of the men who composed that volunteer army came from the ranks of the plain, common people. More than four regiments enlisted in the mountains of eastern Tennessee. They were, with few exceptions, the sons of the laboring men, of the mechanics. They had no property rights to fight for; they fought for the honor and the glory of our common country. [Applause.] They were men who depended upon their daily wage to provide the means of livelihood for their wives and children and were eager and anxious to follow our flag. Well do I remember when the call was made, how nobly and patriotically Tennessee's sons responded—and we all know how illy prepared we were for that war. Our great President, McKinley, hesitated and told Congress that we were not prepared. I remember a great gathering in the city of Knoxyille, where the number of recruits was only excelled by the great city of New York. The patriotic citizens of that city provided shelter, clothing, and provisions until the State could handle the situation.

Well do I remember a number of instances where old men who had bared their breasts to the storm of bullets in the Civil War actually cried when the recruiting officers refused to accept their services.

They went forward and they lived for months under a system of drilling and training in Chickamauga Park. The country remembers that deadly scourge of typhoid fever and how many of the strong, healthy, and robust young men were carried by their new comrades to their last peaceful sleep. I remember when the Secretary of War ordered the removal of many of the regiments from the fever-stricken field of Chickamauga and they sent three regiments to Knoxville, where we have pure air and perfect sanitary conditions. I passed through the hospitals on inspection day and I saw the soldier boys from Ohio, Michigan, and other States fighting not the fight of battle with Spaniards, but fighting for life against the deadly fever. Yet some one here this day complains because the Committee on Pensions wishes to do justice to these men.

Ah, my countrymen, shame upon such a performance! No Spanish-American soldier under our laws to-day can be pensioned unless by the strictest and most overwhelming proof he can show that his disability or injury was incurred in line of duty. Now, if some Spanish-American soldier, as occurred in eastern Tennessee, was killed by an assassin's bullet as he was standing by the side of his wife, this great Government can not pension the widow under existing laws.

The SPEAKER, The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like five minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can give the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. That little widow now lives in the mountains of Campbell County, with five children, without means and without a roof to cover her and her little ones, and yet you tell me that this American Congress, representing more than ninety millions of people, the richest, the greatest, and most powerful and resourceful nation on the face of the earth, turns a deaf ear to her appeal. Heaven have pity on a Republic that would deny help to such a woman. [Applause.]

Take the chairman of this committee [Mr. Richardson], a southern man, a brave ex-Confederate soldier, who reports these | none. It is so ordered, and the reference is so made.

bills. The issue was made against him in a recent primary election in Alabama that he was reporting and supporting these bills. When that appeal or challenge was made to the electorate of that district, they arose in their mighty wrath, putting the seal of their condemnation upon his critics; and, be it said to their everlasting credit, they decided to return him here by an increased majority. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to consume only a moment or two. I am not willing to let go without any answer the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Rodden-BERY], which, in my opinion, slurs both the services and the dangers of the Spanish War soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, in 1898, when the Volunteer soldiers were ordered home from Cuba, I went from my home to Montauk dered home from Cuba, I went from my home to Montauk Point, where, among other regiments, was the regiment from my home city. I felt some responsibility because of the part I had taken which had brought on the Spanish War, and I was desirous of giving any aid that I might to the boys who had gone into the war. The officer in command of the camp at Montauk Point was a former colleague in the House, Gen. Montauk Point was a former colleague in the House, Gen. Wheeler [applause], ex-Confederate soldier, and now also an ex-Union soldier [applause], the man who did much to call attention to the reunion of heart and spirit of the North and the South. And through the courtesy of Gen. Wheeler I was permitted to go through that camp. I watched the Chicago regiment as it landed from the boat and marched to camp up the roadway. I noticed their looks and it brought tears into my eyes. I went through the camp and through the hospital, through tent after tent—these long tents with rows of cots in them—looking especially for any of the boys whom I might know, to see if I could be of any aid to them. And though I have visited many hospitals and seen many people in illness and distress, I never in all my life have seen any case so heart-rending as to illness as I saw when I marched through these tents and saw these boys, yellow and worn to the bone, who only a few months before had marched out in the fullness of hope and health, willing, if necessary, to die for their country, but all of them to forever, during life, bear the results of the hardships they had undertaken.

And whether it be an army in battle, in face of the foe, taking and giving fire, or whether disease overtakes them, it makes no difference to me. The one is as dangerous as the other, and I am willing now, and I hope I shall continue to be willing in the future, to do anything that may be necessary to prove to those who went into the Spanish War and to those who may be asked to volunteer for future wars that if they meet illness, danger, or destruction of health, the great Government of the United States is ready and willing gladly and freely to honor them and itself by taking some care of them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

FLOODS ON THE MISSISSIPPI AND ITS TRIBUTARIES.

Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] in a moment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Sherley] has a matter of necessity which he wishes to present.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a little while ago the President's message relative to the flood situation was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. That part of it that relates to the protection and care of the levees properly belongs to that committee, but that part which relates to reimburse-ment to the War Department for expenses in providing food and shelter to the sufferers from the floods should go to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask unanimous consent that the order made heretofore be vacated, and that a new order be made referring the portions of the message as indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the order made referring the President's message to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be vacated, and that the Chair be authorized to separate the parts of the message and to send one portion, relating to work on the levees, to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the other portion, relating to reimbursing the War Department for money expended for relief of sufferers, to the Committee on Appropria-tions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take up for consideration the bill H. R. 22867, with an amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will please send up to the desk the amendment that he wishes to be read, and the whole matter will be considered together. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JAMES). Is a second demanded?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from alternative to it. The question I present does not come within Alabama. He can not offer an amendment and move to suspend the rules at the same time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Richardson] moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment, which was in order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I ask for a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Richardson] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] for 20 minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the original bill carries $2,664, embracing in all 17 cases. Ten of them are of the War with Spain; four of them are of the regular Navy cases; one is an Indian war increase, and one is a Mexican War increase. The amendment offered carries with it about $900, making in all $3,564 which the original bill and the amendment carry.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.
Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, this is the third or fourth installment of private pension bills for certain Spanish War soldiers who are not entitled under the general law to receive pensions, and is just another bill presented by the chairman of the committee to be passed in the House without opporof the committee to be passed in the House without oppor-tunity for amendment, without opportunity for discussion para-graph by paragraph, leaving the House absolutely powerless to perfect a bill. There is nothing left for Members to do in its consideration save to go through with the formality of a few words of discussion; and this, notwithstanding the fact that there is now a special rule of the House providing for the consideration and passage of just such pension bills, allowing amendment, allowing discussion, allowing consideration, and allowing an opportunity to perfect the bill.

Some days ago I submitted to the House and had referred to the Committee on Rules a resolution providing for an amendment to the rules, so that there could be no chance of filibustering against these bills. I asked to have it read to the House, and it was objected to, and I now place it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

Resolution.

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended as follows:
First. No omnibus private pension bill shall be considered by the House-until the full report of the committee thereon shall have once been printed in the Record 10 days previous to calling such bill up for consideration.

Second. All general debate on any omnibus private pension bill shall be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by proponents of the bill and one-half by the opponents of the bill.

Third. No omnibus private pension bill shall be placed on its passage under suspension of the rules or any special rule, except Members first shall have had opportunity to debate any such bill two hours under the five-minute rule.

the five-minute rule.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Austin] has just said that this is a great country; that it is a rich and powerful country; that there is no other country like it under the sun. In that I wholly and fully acquiesce. Moreover, it should be such a great country that when it comes to dealing with the pensions of the soldiers of any war, its representatives should see that a pension is bestowed upon every deserving soldier, upon every deserving widow, upon every deserving dependent child, and that no wholesale pension bills should be brought here, putting on the rolls men who never saw war, who never faced danger, who never sustained injury, who never suffered in hospital, who never called in a doctor, who never made a sacrifice. This House should see that the taxpayers of the Republic should not for 50 years be burdened to pay large pensions to thousands of soldiers who, during their enlistment, did less work than ever before and drew higher pay than they ever drew before or may ever draw again. These private bills carry pensions for soldiers who can not meet the requirements of the Pension Office, who can not make a showing of any service to the countries of the countr try. The valiant Spanish-American War soldier does not subscribe to that. Pension schemers may form a vast organization and give it some patriotic name, and gather into it many patriotic men; but tied onto it will be all the bummers, all the beats, all the grafters, all the pillagers, all the swindlers, all those who desire to rob the Government by drawing pensions. The honest toilers who send us here will groan under the weight of taxation to pay them. You are to-day, by passing these special bills without orderly consideration, laying the foundation for a system of exploiting the Treasury of the 90,000,000 people of this country in the name of patriotism and in the name of rewarding the soldiers, which will result in those who rendered no service and made no sacrifice being placed upon the pension rolls, there to abide for threescore years and ten. There is no the scope of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

Nobody raises objection to pensioning the Spanish War soldier who returns minus an arm, or short a leg, or enfeebled from disease, or pallid and weak from any infirmity that may have assailed him. But when they came out strong, vigorous, youthful, robust after eight months or six months or four months of encampment in places provided by the Government, you are providing that the Treasury of the people of this country for the next half a century shall be the feed trough where they shall come and fatten upon the resources of the people and drink deeply of our revenues, because they do not go forth and do battle in the fields of industry and in the avenues of I place it with you now, and you vote on it as you judge.

I now direct my remarks again to a subject in which we were interrupted just now. The old soldiers of the Federal Army and of the Spanish-American War Army are a part of the great Government, and they are entitled to just recognition by it. This should not be, and I presume is not, in any sense a political measure.

But if you are going to recognize them, as the gentleman from Illinois says, by letting the boy of America know that when he enlists in the Army his Government will protect him and reward him, we should be equally sure not to let the camp hanger, not to let the holiday hunter, the adventurer who is disposed to roam and exploit, find a lodgment for all his life on the pension roll.

What will be the result? The indifferent volunteer soldier of our country will have a pension for life. It will discount thrift; it will give assurance of the care of the Government to the improvident; it will not encourage them to hew the logs; it will not encourage them to stir the soil; it will not encourage them to save the pennies; but it will encourage the volunteer soldier to look to the Government to care for him. It will say to an American volunteer, "No matter how lazy or shiftless you are, your name once enrolled, the Government will provide for you." With this policy you will lay the foundation of firing the youth of the country with the ambition to go into the Army for ease and certainty of a purse.

This policy will destroy every vestige of patriotic ambition of thousands of youths in this country, who should feel that it is not for the reward of pensions that they enlist, but that it is for service under the flag to their country. But, under the gentleman's line of argument, boys would go to war because they will be pensioned all the rest of their lives. The motive ought to be that I will enlist because I am a citizen of the Republic; my country needs my services: I will volunteer: I will do battle: I will die because of patriotism and not for pension; for love of country, not avarice for the Treasury of the Government. Of such material only is builded an invincible army. Thus you build the soldiery for war, the citizen for peace; but in this great rush at the Treasury of the Nation, assuring every youth in the land that there is pension for him, you discount the real ambition that should swell the heart of youth and the animation that should impel the patriotic citizen to offer his life for his fing.

Our country has a sad illustration of the misguided teachings of proper relations of a people to the Government and Forty years ago, when the struggle was over, millions of slaves were given their freedom and liberty. have been taught nothing since as persistently as that all they have to do is to covet an office, read books, and become And so it is 40 years after we have the African race more lawless, less thrifty, more degraded, and less reliablemore immoral on the average than they were the day the shackles were stricken from them. The average African will pilfer the henhouse and dodge the plow handle quicker to-day than he would 12 months after liberty was given him. he will stand in the dark and assassinate you quicker than he would when the shackles were yet fresh from his hands. Why? Because this Government put false notions in his head, laid down unsound teachings for his guidance, and led them to labor under the misapprehension that they were on the way to equality with the Anglo-Saxon.

The great blunder of this Nation was not in liberating the That question was settled. The greatest blunder in our country's history was that after we freed him we undertook by decree of law to make him the equal of the white man-an equality that the God of the universe had decreed 6,000 years ago he could not possess and never would.

Our Republic, in the frenzy of the hour, undertook to repeal the law of Jehovah, and thus to make the African the equal of the Caucasian. We have sought by law and by Constitution to Mr give him a moral and social and intellectual and political that.

status for which he is not qualified now by nature and for want of created endowment never can be. It is not only dan-gerous to this country, but it is an injustice to the African race itself that the laws of our Government hold out to him aspirations that he can never attain, puts in his heart hopes he can never realize, instills in his mind ideas and standards that are beyond his reach. He can never rise to the same standard of the Caucasian until you go back beyond Sinai into the bowels of God's first creation and discover the molds out of which He fashioned him, and have Jehovah again take of the dust and fashion him a different order of man. He is inferior by creation. Inferior in intellect, inferior in characteristics, inferior in instincts, inferior in the original elements from which a strong and self-governing people must be evolved. It is no fault of ours, it is no fault of the African race. It is a fact of nature. insurmountable and irremediable.

No law of man, no statute of country, no edict of any republic will ever repeal the law of the Almighty Jehovah that decreed him an African and decreed us Caucasians. Law can not do that any more than it can change the leopard's spots. Being the stronger race, we owe it to the African to turn him from this false doctrine and place in his bosom hopes he can realize and aspirations he can attain. Turn them into the avenues for which the Creator ordained them. Give them every protection of the law, every safeguard of the statute, and vouchsafe to them the fullest sympathy and aid in their capable spheres. But when we undertake to change the law of creation and make them what the infinite Creator decreed they should not be, we undertake the impossible. It is beyond the power of constitutions and unattainable by arts of man. When you undertake to legislate morals into creatures that the great God failed to endow with those instincts capable of cultivation and development, you undertake the impossible. The African in this country is susceptible of filling his proper sphere, but that sphere is not in the Pension Office, it is not a Register of the Treasury, it is not as postmaster, it is not as political leader, it is not as a governing factor; but it is as that inferior creature that God So long as our laws and our teachings hold out to made him. him the hope of a status which he can never attain, he is doomed to disappointment and decay. You might just as well go out here to the Zoological Garden and from the cages take one of the brown monkeys and one of the black orang-utans and place them on the Speaker's stand there, and then pass a statute by this House, have it concurred in by the Senate, and signed by the President, hereafter decreeing the monkey and the orangutan our equals in all respects, and expect it to be so, as to expect by law to establish the negro the equal of the Angio-American.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

LEVEES ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 23246) appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of maintaining and protecting against the impending flood the levees on the Mississippi River and rivers tributary thereto, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk rend as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $300,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi Elver Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the purpose of maintaining and protecting against the impending flood the levees on the Mississippi River and rivers tributary thereto.

Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, so that there may be some explanation, I demand a second.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois to 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask if this follows the lines of the message that just came in?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. That message referred to an appropriation for additional protection to the levces and also an appropriation for help or aid to those who are being injured there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The bill does not include

Mr. MANN. The message did.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; the message did.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman's bill cover?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The $300,000 in this bill is simply for the purpose of protecting the levees against the

Mr. WICKLIFFE. This is for protection and not for relief. Mr. BARTLETT. It supplements the other bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; it is along the lines of the first bill, as subsequently amended by the resolution the House adopted on the 8th of this month.

Mr. FOWLER. Does it apply to the tributaries of the Mississippi?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; including the tributaries. It is exactly as the original bill would have read if the amendment which was adopted at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] a few days afterwards had been incorporated in that original bill. In other words, it provides for the protection and the prevention from destruction of the leves of the Mississippi River and the tributaries thereof.

Mr. MANN. The original resolution provided for this aid for the levees between Cape Girardeau and the mouth of the Mississippi River, as I remember it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I thought myself that it probably ought to have authorized aid to any levees above Cape Girardeau. I see that this does

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. Now, let me state the reasons for this legislation:

I have just returned from the Mississippi River, where I spent the past week or 10 days, and I am therefore able to speak with knowledge of the serious situation which confronts the people in the Deltas. We have appropriated very liberally in the past for the construction of levees along the lower river, and the people whose lands are thereby protected from floods have also contributed many millions of dollars for this same purpose. The ratio of the contribution has usually been about $2 by the riparian owners to every $1 appropriated by the Government. We had reached the conclusion, in view of the prior floods of the river, that our levees were about completed and that they were high enough to withstand any flood that would ever come. Heretofore the floods which have come down the Ohio River have always passed away before the flood waters from the Missouri and upper Mississippi reached the mouth of the Ohio at Cairo; but this year, for the first time so far as we are advised, the floods came out of these three great tributaries at the same time. The result of this unfortunate situation was that the river from Cairo down rose from 2 to 4 feet higher than ever before known. I walked along the top of the levees last week for a long distance, where thousands of men were engaged in piling sacks of dirt along the tops of the levees to keep back the flood. These levees were 2 feet higher than the highest water ever had gone before, and yet when I was there the water had reached the crest of the levee and was still rising. Gov. Brewer, of Mississippi, came in person and brought 600 convicts from the State penitentiary, and with the volunteers was working desperately to prevent the flood from overtopping the levee. The particular levee district whose levees I was inspecting has expended $300,000, which had been raised by taxes and the sale of bonds, in fighting this flood, and has now, in fact, practically exhausted all its own resources. Since that time the levees have broken on the opposite side, in Arkansas and Louisiana, and thereby relieved the great strain to some extent along the Mississippi front, but the danger has by no means passed. The water will stand against these levees for the next 10 days, and as long as it does the possibility of disaster will be present, and eternal vigilance will be the price of safety.

We have this year the greatest flood we have ever had on that river in all of its history, so far as any record shows, and a few days ago Congress appropriated $350,000 to aid the communities along the river in preventing the destruction of the levees that had been built by the Government and by the people along the banks of the river in cooperation with the Government. That money has been allotted now by the proper au-thority, and the engineers in the several districts have tele-graphed to the Chief of Engineers that it is necessary to have more money. I would have the House to understand this: The people in these communities have expended for this particular purpose since this flood came a great deal more money than the Government has been asked to expend.

The Chief of Engineers gave it as his opinion in his statement before our committee to-day that the people themselves Mr. MAN during the past three weeks have spent about $2,000,000, which into a law.

was raised under the system of taxation that prevails along the lower regions of the river. There they raise money and authorize, in an emergency such as this, the sale of bonds, and they have expended perhaps $2,000,000 in trying to save these levees since this flood came. The impression is very general and very natural, because the information that country gets of course is solely from the newspapers, that these levees have all been swept away and that the great valley has already been overflowed. That is not true. Not more than 15 or 20 per cent of the area which is protected by the levees has been submerged or will be submerged by the breaks which have already oc-curred, so that from 80 to 85 per cent of the protected areas in that valley are still being protected by the levees as they stand, and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War and the President have requested Congress to supplement the $350,000 heretofore authorized, because they believe that the situation is such that it will be necessary to spend this amount of money before the flood finally passes. Now, let me say this: Although the crest of the flood has passed below Memphis and is now possibly about Vicksburg, as a matter of fact, the river stands to-day on the gauge at Cairo higher than it has ever stood before since the Government has had any record of the river, and for at least two weeks or possibly three weeks—

Mr. WICKLIFFE. That is, higher than in any former year.
Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. It went higher this year, it went to 54 feet this year, the highest before was 52.2, and it is now above 53 feet, and is now higher than has ever been known before in the history of the river, so far as we have record of it prior to this year. It will take three weeks for that flood to pass down the river, and during those three weeks the levees will all be subjected to a tremendous strain and disaster will be impending along different reaches of the river until this flood does pass.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. PROUTY. I was not able to hear the bill read. I would like to inquire whether or not this covers any levees above Cape Girardeau?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; it covers any levees on the Mississippi River or its tributaries. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I desire now to yield to Mr.

WICKLIFFE, the author of the bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to add anything, if the House is ready to vote at this time, and I hope they will vote at this time. I think the matter has been clearly presented by the gentleman from Mississippi, and I hope the House will promptly pass the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman one ques-

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to know if you understand this appropriation to be an emergency appropriation to be used against the present flood or an appropriation to be used after the flood subsides to repair whatever damage may be done?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; it is to prevent disaster from the present flood. After the flood has passed away, I will say to the gentleman, Congress has already appropriated money that will be available for all repairs. That has already been appropriated, but it is not now available for this particular emergency.

Mr. FOWLER. What does the gentleman understand that appropriation to consist of for making these repairs?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. To build levees anew, if necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. That is not the $350,000 emergency appropriation passed a few days ago?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; there are three and a half million dollars carried in the river and harbor appropriation bill, which become immediately available, I will say to the gentleman, unlike ordinary appropriations, which become available July 1. That appropriation will become available immediately upon being signed by the President.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman refers to the item in the river and harbor appropriation bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. We have passed it. Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I said it passed the House.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say it passed

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I said it would become immediately available as soon as the President affixed his sig-

Mr. GARRETT. As a matter of fact, the allotments made ont of the $350,000 appropriation which was passed a few days ago have been bearing about the same ratio to the local expenditures that the past expenditures on the levees have borne to the local expenditures. Is not that true?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; because the local expenditures on levees heretofore have been about $2 to the Government's $1. In this emergency the local contribution has been $5 or $6 to the Government's $1.

Mr. GARRETT. But the ratio has been about the same? Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; it is very much

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair twothirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ORDER RELATIVE TO PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the order which I send to the Clerk's desk. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Order 35.

Ordered, That on the second and fourth Fridays of each month during the present session it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain one or more motions to suspend the rules and pass private pension bills.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

I ask unanimous consent that the second Mr. RUSSELL.

may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Russell] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] 20 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this order simply is to enable this House to utilize the day fixed by rules of the House for the passing of private pension bills. Under the rules of the House the second and fourth Fridays are the days especially set apart for the consideration of private pension bills. Our experience has shown to us on two or three occasions that we had great difficulty, if we could succeed at all, in passing pension bills on those days because of a filibuster that was conducted against them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Russell] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Bartlett]?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield. Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman if his committee, or he, or any other Member of the House has introduced any resolution like this and had it referred to the Committee on Rules for their consideration?

Mr. RUSSELL. We have not. Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think that would be the more orderly way of changing the rules of the House on the subject of suspension day than by taking it up here without notice to the membership and change the rules in a radical way?

Mr. RUSSELL. This is not changing the rules, but these are the days which the rules now provide for the passing of pension bills, and this order provides that the suspension of the rules which is now permissible on the first and third Mondays may be permitted and in order on the second and fourth Fridays for the purpose of passing private pension bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to answer the gentleman by saying that the rules of the House prescribe the order of the business of the House. They prescribe what days shall be suspension days, naming the first and third Mondays of each month. This order, if it passes the House, changes the rules of the House, and makes two other suspension days during each month in addition to what we have. It is virtually a change of the rules of the House. I suggest to the gentleman that a resolution of this kind, if referred to the Committee on Rules, might be reported by that committee and be passed.

It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, to say that this is about as radical a proposition as I have seen in all the 17 years of my service, 16 of which have been in a Republican House, most of the time presided over by former Speaker Cannon, and I have never heard come from him or his side during the years of his service a more radical proposition to change the rules without notice or without action by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RUSSELL. That may be very true, but this is the day especially provided for suspending the rules.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the reason given always by those who advocated this kind of gag rule, when coming from the Committee on Rules in a Republican House, was that a majority had a right to do business. That was always the reason given for this sort of procedure-the same old song, now sung by unfamiliar voices. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, I do not know what other individual Members of the House may think, but I think this House has a right to attend to its business. And it is evident from the experience we have had in this House that we can not attend to all'the business on the calendar and intended to be done on pension Fridays, specially set apart under the rules for the consideration of pension bills. It is necessary to do something so that the will of this House may be expressed, and we think we are justified in asking that suspension days be extended to include pension Fridays, so that we may attend to the business of this House. This is a day set apart for the suspension of the rules, and as I understand, from the authorities of this House, we have the right to suspend the rules and to fix an order of this sort. I have offered this motion for the consideration of the House, and, of course, with the understanding that unless two-thirds of the Members present vote for it it can not be adopted. But it is done in the luterest of the business of the House, and it seems to me that it is evident that unless this rule can be passed we will have great difficulty in passing our private pension bills.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.
Mr. MANN. If this order should be agreed to, would it not then allow more time for the discussion of private pension bills than has ever been used while the gentleman has been a Member of the House, except upon one or two recent occasions?

Mr. RUSSELL. During my experience; yes. Since I have been in the House I have never seen any time consumed outside of the time required in reading the bills and the formal proceedings of passing them until the present session.

Mr. MANN. So that, as a matter of fact, while this rule may seem more drastic than such rules usually are, it allows more liberality than has usually been permitted in giving Members more time in discussing pension bills?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.
Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I yield.
Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not mean to say that if this rule is changed to Friday instead of Monday for pension bills more pensions will be passed? Will they not be passed on Friday just as they are passed here?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.
Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, you will have just as much opportunity to discuss bills on Friday as now, and that is no opportunity at all.

Mr. MANN. So far as I recollect, the opportunity to amend pension bills usually means an additional amount taken out of pension bills usually means an additional amount taken out of pension bills usually means an additional amount taken out of pension bills usually means an additional amount taken out of fact, the Treasury, and never the other way. As a matter of fact, this will allow more time than has yet been consumed in the practice of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, I did not understand the gentleman. That is true

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Rus-SELL] has used nine minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his idea that under the rule more than one bill can be called up at a time?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I do not think so. I understand the purpose to be to call up the bills one at a time. The Invalid Pension Committee of the House has one omnibus bill on the Private Calendar that we hoped to call up to-day, but it seems now we can not do it. There are eight omnibus pension bills pending in this House that have been passed by the Senate and are now on the calendar, so that there are nine omnibus pension bills now on our calendar, embracing over 1,200 individual pensions.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason I asked the question was this: I have some doubt in my mind whether you could constitutionally pass those bills except by considering each one separately; but I had heard outside that it was the desire of some gentlemen to pass them in a lump; and I wanted to know if this rule, in the contemplation of those offering it, was intended to bring about that situation?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, sir. This rule is intended to obviate that necessity

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no necessity of that kind. I do not think you can do it under this rule. But I just wanted to have the gentleman disclaim it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether I ought to say this, but I think it is perfectly proper. I was told to-day that it was the intention of some of the gentlemen on the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move to suspend the rules and pass a half dozen bills. I looked up the Constitution and the law, and I do not undertake to say whether they can do it or not. But I went to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Russell] and told him that, in my judgment, such a proposition ought not to be submitted to the House; that I could not support it; and that I thought the proper way to reach this pension business would be to move to suspend the rules and pass an order something like the one that the gentleman has now proposed, because that gives some time for debate and does not put the House in the position where it would be compelled to pass upon the propriety of passing half a dozen bills under one motion, which I do not think should be done.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say in answer to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] has said that there never was a fixed purpose on the part of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to pass the bills in that way. I will say that the advisability of it was being considered as one way in which we might be able to get the bills passed to-day; but the Pension Committee never did determine to pass them in that way. The matter was considered and discussed, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] and the leader upon the Democratic side of the House [Mr. Underwood] suggested that this would be a proper method of avoiding these difficulties, and would give us the day that the rules now give us, simply extending the right of suspending the rules to those days, the two Fridays in each month now set apart by the rules for considering private pension bills, so that we might get the bills through on those days.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit me, that being the view of the matter, why did not the gentleman introduce his resolution and let the Committee on Rules consider it? Why spring it here without the Committee on Rules ever having considered it?

Mr. RUSSELL. Just for the reason that, as I understand it, we could not pass this rule or make this order on any other day except on suspension day.

Mr. BARTLETT. We can if the Committee on Rules re-

Mr. RUSSELL. I will simply say that I have offered it to-day because this is the day fixed for suspension of the rules, and I understood that we could pass it to-day under suspension of the rules, and it was suggested to me by both the majority and minority leaders of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I heard this motion, but only heard it imperfectly. Does this motion contemplate a suspension of the rules by a majority vote?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; it contemplates that there may be a suspension of the rules, just as now, by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will remember that in a former Congress we once before began the manipulation of the suspension of the rules, and the final result was that it took only a majority vote in lieu of a two-thirds vote.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not understand that this will change the rule as to that. It will still require a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules and pass a bill. We are merely asking to be permitted to move to suspend the rules and pass pension bills on pension Fridays.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have never been illiberal in regard to pension matters since I have been a Member of this House. I could not see my way clear to vote for the so-called Sherwood bill, but I have never joined with those gentlemen who have obstreperously opposed these private pension bills on the floor of the House. But it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this reaches what the Katzenjammers would call the end To amend the rules of the House so as to make of the limit. private bills of a higher privilege than they have ever possessed before, under any régime, 50 years after the war is over, putting them in a higher special class than that possessed by any public bill is, it seems to me, going too far.

In my seven years of service here I have never seen the time when private peusion bills have suffered. This House has always found a way to pass every private pension bill that has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions since I have been a Member of this House.

A few days ago, after the terrific filibustering fight made here by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Roddenbery], we found a way to pass the bills. We can do the same thing again. not believe it is wise to come here under a suspension of the rules, with about a third of the membership of the House present, and amend the rules of this House at this stage of the session, particularly when you are picking out private bills, to give them a privilege that no public bill can have.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining. Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from

Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY]

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, there is no justification for this proposed rule. Any man of common backwoods intelligence, like a country Congressman from the wire-grass section, knows that a legislative body must do business. Even a weakminded Congressman, whose constituency by some oversight have permitted him to break into this great and august body, would recognize that no one Member and no handful of Members could perpetually delay legislation. But I trust that it is not within the power of such a handful of Members to be so potential that it is necessary for the overwhelming Democratic majority to resort to a rule so drastic in its character that it denies the right of amendment and denies the right of fair consideration. Prepare a rule that limits the debate on these private pension bills to an hour or to a reasonable time. Pre-pare a rule that limits the right of amendment within reason and within judgment, and let Members have the privilege of offering them and considering them, and then when that reasonable time is out vote the obstreperous Member and fillbusterer down, if the House so wills, and go on.

But I challenge you to pass in this House the rule now pro-posed which denies absolutely the right of offering an amendment, the right of considering an amendment. If you think it will save any time you may find to the contrary. You could not have reached these bills to-day, even under the existing gag rule, if there had been a desire to filibuster. You can not adopt this un-Democratic rule without making the shades of Cannon and the shadows of DALZELL go into eclipse. [Laughter.] You can not by such procedure dispatch this business. I notify you now that if you pass a rule of this character, without being referred to the regularly selected committee and without being passed on by that committee of our Democratic colleagues constituted for the purpose, that you will have no less a hard time doing business. Whenever the Democratic Committee on Rules considers a rule and gives the right to be heard and offer an amendment-which your rule does not do-I yield to that judgment. Ignore that committee and without notice to the House pass this rule if you will, I prophesy you will save no time.

I have an amendment here now that I would like to offer, realize that under the rules it can not be offered. Member of the 394 public servants can send to the desk at this moment an amendment to your rule and get it considered, and yet you say we have reformed the rules and that Cannonism is overthrown. To perdition with it. [Laughter.]
Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have always followed the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions in their reports on private pension bills, because of the utter impossibility of examining the reports which they submit; and yet I should not wish to put myself in a position of asserting that these committees can never, either inadvertently or otherwise, make errors in including specific cases in such bills and providing additional pensions or special pensions to those seeking relief from the Government.

I recall that early in my service in the House the practice was to report bills separately for each applicant. At that time there was very considerable opposition to some of the bills, opposition to such an extent that it was necessary to abandon the Friday night sessions and to consider the bills on Fridays during the daytime.

The practice later was initiated of passing omnibus pension bills. My experience with these committees has been that it is necessary to have a meritorious case in order to obtain a favorable report. That has been my experience, both under the Democratic control of the House and under the Republican control of the House. Because some individual Members of the House, however, have had an opportunity and have given the time necessary to investigate the individual cases contained in these omnibus bills, and have expressed their opposition to certain of the cases on the floor, is not sufficient to justify me, although it may delay the passage of these bills somewhat, to deprive Members of the House of the opportunity to present whatever material they may obtain in their investigation, and to ask the House to pass upon amendments which they desire to

I am willing to follow the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions to all reasonable limits in the passage of omnibus pension bills, but I do not intend to be tied, like the victims of former days, to the charlot of these committees and dragged to the support of these bills regardless of their contents. I shall not vote at this time to support a rule of this character.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentlemn yield?
Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.
Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the House ought to spend its time on two Fridays a month during the balance of this session considering pension bills, with no possibility of passing them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that they can not be passed and considered properly. I know of no reason why a very limited time should not be given to general debate and an opportunity given to those gentlemen who have time and do examine the bills to present whatever information they have and to offer whatever amendments they desire. Otherwise the House must assume that the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions, both of the Senate and the House, will never present a case for consideration to this body that is not meritorious. I do not believe that we should be put in a position of being compelled to vote against granting special assistance to several hundred applicants because of some case that might not meet our approval or compelled to refuse to vote for pensions that are meritorious pensions in order to withhold one case that does not meet our judgment. At this stage of the session I do not see the necessity for such action as is proposed in the pending resolution, and I shall not support it. The House could meet at 10 o'clock each Friday morning, if necessary

Mr. MANN. And sit until 10 o'clock at night, if two or three Members are opposed to the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, it could easily pass the bill.
Mr. FOSTER. Did we not spend a whole day and far into the night and yet not pass the bill until the Committee on Rules brought in a special rule?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, my sympathies are just as much with the men who will be the beneficiaries of this legislation as are the sympathies of any Member of the House, but I shall not put myself in the position of making it impossible for any Member of the House to point out cases that might not be justified and preventing the House to pass upon such cases. Those who justfy such action may vote for this resolution. I shall not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, until this session I never saw a private bill of any sort passed under suspension of the rules, and this is a new departure, not justified by an emergency now existing. One of the great conflicts in this country during the last election was over the protest made against the method by which the business of the House had been conducted under what was known as the Cannon rules, frequently called "gag rules." It was claimed that whenever the Republicans It was claimed that whenever the Republicans desired to do that which they wished to do they passed certain rules, denominated gag rules, and I doubt not that from 20 to 30 seats upon the Democratic side of the House are now being filled by Democrats because of the assault upon that kind of legislation in the House during the sessions in which the Republicans had the majority and when Speaker Cannon was in power. This resolution is but a repetition of the Cannon There are a great number of bills of public improcedure. portance upon the calendar, which many think important and which this Congress should enact into law, or that the Representatives here should have an opportunity to consider and vote upon. In my opinion, there is something else for this Congress to do except to pass pension legislation and private pension bills. I have not during my service thought proper to oppose by a speech, but I have opposed by my vote many times, bills granting pensions when I did not think them meritorious. I voted against the Sulloway bill. I voted against the Sherwood bill. I think this pension legislation has gone far enough, and in many cases too far. Our Government is exceedingly liberal in granting pensions to its soldiers; more so than any other country in the world. I have always felt some delicacy in raising my voice against pension legislation, since I come from a section which at one time was engaged in war with those to whom the pensions are now being granted. I did not feel called upon to raise my voice against granting pensions in cases that appeared meritorious, but I shall not vote for a rule which proposes to wrench from their moorings the staid rules of this House and place in a favorite position private pension bills of every character and give them precedence over legislation of every other kind.

Last Congress there were passed 9,640 private pension bills, and both Houses have passed a service-pension bill; still the calendar is crowded with other private bills. Yet because those in charge of pension bills have not been able to pass them with the celerity and rapidity they desire to do, because some Members of this Congress have seen fit to exercise their constitutional right to be heard in opposition to pension bills, it is now said, in order to crush out a few Members and keep them from being heard, from criticizing those bill and showing their want of merit, that the rules of the House, made after due consideration by a committee, and after being carefully adopted by the House in the beginning of this Congress, are to be changed all at once, without notice to the House, without submitting the matter to the committee of the House to which such matters are usually referred-and for what, Mr. Speaker? That they may have an opportunity further to swell the pension roll by special bills, and if there shall be cases not meritorious to be considered on Fridays in any of the omnibus bills no man shall have an opportunity to move to strike them out. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Russell] and his associates have raised the pension flag and propose, with the aid of this resolution, to march on, over all opposition, and to trample beneath their feet the orderly, legitimate way of proceeding that the House has marked out by the establishment of rules for the government of the public business. I protest against such a new departure and such radical change of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Missouri desire to consume some of his time now?

Mr. RUSSELL. No. We will have only one speech remaining

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I repeat again what I said in the beginning, that personally I have never been illiberal toward pensions or special pension bills. But I have not during my service here at any time seen the occasion arise for putting into the general rules of the House. nor have I ever seen the effort made before to put into the general rules of the House, a proposition to pass an omnibus pension bill under suspension. This proposition, Mr. Speaker, pension bill under suspension. This proposition, Mr. Speaker, has not been introduced into the basket and considered by the committee charged with the consideration of such matters in this House. No reasons have been assigned for it before that committee, because it has not been before the committee. No reasons have been assigned for it here on the floor, because there is no reason to justify such an amendment to the general rules of this House at this stage of the session.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules and adopting this order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this order does not change the rules of the House. It is not an unusual thing in the procedure of this House to pass an order regulating the business of the House under suspension of the rules. It has been done repeatedly before. Now the question of how these bills shall be passed, as to whether they should be taken up in the regular way or whether they should be passed under suspension of the rules, is not a matter that is involved here. These bills could be passed, if the chairmen of the committees or those having them in charge desired to do so, and they had time to do so, in the regular way on Friday. It is in order for any man in this House, or the chairman of any committee, to move to suspend the rules and pass any proposition in this House on suspension Mondays, provided he is recognized for that purpose. that is done by this order is this: The chairmen of the Pensions Committees have obtained recognition on suspension Mondays to pass pension bills to the exclusion of practically every other business that comes before this House. The pressure of great public business-appropriations bills, revenue bills, and other general legislation-is such that there are very few days left for the disposition of the private business of the House. It is practically limited to suspension days, on which unanimous consent may be had, and to Calendar Wednesdays. we all know that there will be very few bilis passed between now and the close of the session on Calendar Wednesdays, because the chairmen of committees bring up their most important bills on Calendar Wednesday that bring on debate, and one committee will consume two days, or the Calendar Wednesdays of two weeks. The result is that in order that the Members of this House may have an opportunity to pass practically uncontested bills they must have the right to get recognition on Mondays to suspend the rules. Now, there is nothing revolutionary or radical or reactionary in suspending the rules. It has come down since the first Congress. There has never been any criticism about passing a bill under suspension of the rules; and Because it takes a two-thirds vote of the membership of this House to pass any resolution or bill on a motion to suspend the rules, and it has always been assumed by the membership of this House and the country at large that if a bill required amendment in important particulars, if it did not have a conclusive majority of the House as it was written and presented, that you could not command to its support a two-thirds vote in the House. Now, the only proposition here is—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the order adopted?

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair—Mr. GARRETT and Mr. RODDENBERY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 23.
Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.]

One hundred and fifteen gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were-ayes 29, noes 79.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and

The SPEAKER. Seventeen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the roll will be called on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt this order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 57, answered "present" 7, not voting 176, as follows:

lowing prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth and of them that are afar off upon the sea, our hearts are overwhelmed within us because of the sore distress of our people and the sad fate that has overtaken our brethren in the great deep. In all their afflictions we are afflicted. And to whom may we turn, O Lord, but to Thee, who art our refuge and our strength and a very present help in trouble? Thou art the eternal God and Thou art our refuge. Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. The sea is Thine and Thou hast made it. Though Thou slay us, yet will we trust in Thee. Comfort our hearts, O God, and gra-ciously grant that neither height nor depth may separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Thy name's sake hear our cry and answer our prayer. Amen. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. MEAT-INSPECTION SERVICE (S. DOC. NO. 569).

Brower, vice president of the Puget Sound Savings Bank, of Tacoma, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of the sof of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Owen bill providing for establishment of a national department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Palouse; of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Pullman; and of sundry citizens of Palouse and Pullman, all in the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the condemnation and purchase of express companies by the Government, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NELSON. I present petitions in the form of telegrams from sundry railroad employees in the State of Minnesota, relative to the workmen's compensation bill. I ask that the telegrams be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

DULUTH, MINN., April 8, 1912.

Hon. Knute Nelson,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of Duluth Lodge, No. S31, in regular session, unanimously indorsed Senate bill 5382 on workingmen's compensation, and would respectfully request you to give it your support. While the compensation provided for in some instances seems low, we indorsed the bill because we recognize that it writes into law the correct principle. Whatever defects it may possess can be corrected by experience. In any event the bill will be a vast improvement over the present obsolete and injunitous employers' liability. Every railroad man in Minnesota wants a change, and we believe this is the best that can be had now.

Secretary, 2224 West First Street.

Hom Knute Nelson,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At yesterday's meeting of Lodge No. 569, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Duluth, we adopted by unanimous vote a resolution indorsing Senate bill 5382 on workingmen's compensation, and we would request you to give the measure your support. In passing upon this bill we recognize that it is not a perfect measure, but anything is better than the present cruel system of employers' liability. We are interested permanently in establishing the right principle for automatic compensation for injuries to employees. Defects can only be remedied in the light of experience. Will you help us?

Representing 3,000 railroad employees of this State, I am instructed to request your favorable assistance toward the passage of Senate bill No. 5382. The workmen's compensation act is an important measure, and we urge your cooperation in our behalf. C. S. BOOTON, Secretary State Legislative Board.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present a telegram which I have received on the same subject, and ask to have it read. There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., April 14, 1912.

Senator C. A. CULBERSON, Washington, D. C.:

Heartily in accord with your minority report on the Sutherland compensation act. The Locomotive Firemen State Legislative Board, just adjourned, instructed me to proceed to Washington in opposition to the bill. Kindly wire at my expense calendar position of bill in both Houses. Start from here about 17th.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have received a great many telegrams and letters, and so far they have all been in favor of the bill to which the telegrams to the Senator from Minnesota were directed. I have not presented them because I assume that other Senators are also receiving a great many similar ones, and I have therefore presumed that it was unnecessary to encumber the Record with any large number of them. Of course, I have no objection to those that have been offered, but I think that we shall hardly be able to admit to the RECORD all the letters and telegrams that have been received and will be received on this subject.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before passing from this subject, I hope I may be indulged to say that I also have received a number of telegrams and communications by letter in regard to this bill from railroad organizations in my State. With one exception they have all been opposed to the bill, and they desire that it be defeated. There has been one railroad organization in the State that has communicated with me to the effect that they desire its passage, but with that exception all the others have been adverse to the passage of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senate is now considering the employers' liability bill, I should like to have—

LEGISLATIVE BOARD,

STATE OF TENNESSEE,
Knowville, Tenn., April 9, 1912.

Hon. Newell Sanders.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: As one of the honored Senators of Tennessee, I desire to call your attention to Senate bill No. 5382, known as the workman's compensation act. As you are doubtless aware, the entire subject of employers' liability has been studied by an able commission, and the bill is the result of their labors.

When you study the bill I think you will find it a very desirable piece of legislation, beneficial alike to the employer and the employee. It will rightfully place the cost of personal injuries as a part of the cost of production, pass it on to the final consumer, and result in the cases being settled out of court. It will cost the railroad companies only a little more than the present system and will give the employees more than twice as much. This will result from the saving in the cost of litigation.

Of course, the amount of recovery is limited, fixed, instead of leaving it to the caprice of the jury, but it gives the compensation without a lawsuit and when it is most needed. The right to sue is not much benefit to a widow and her children. But the great number of personalinjury lawsuits are a severe annoyance to the employer.

Mr. Herman E. Wills represents us at Washington, and I hope you can discuss it with him.

Very truly, yours,

T. J. HOSKINS, Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC REALTH.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have some telegrams in the nature of petitions which I desire to present. I want to say, in connection with the matter that has already been referred to, that I have received a great many telegrams indorsing the compensation act proposed from my State. My people, however, are much interested in another proposition that appears to them at least to be very serious, it bearing the honored name of the Senator from Okłahoma [Mr. Owen]. While I know he is a "progressive," and I am satisfied he would not take away the liberties of any of our people, a great many of my people are rather fearful. I want to read one telegram I have received, which reads as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 15, 1912.

Senator Wesler L. Jones, Washington, D. C.:

Vote in favor of the Owen bill means the establishment of one of the worst trusts in our country; its defeat means that we can still choose our own physician and our own medical school. We don't want any interference with our present vested rights of freedom. W ELWANGER.

This feeling seems to have spread considerably among my people. I have another telegram from Seattle, which reads as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 15, 1912.

Senator Wesley L. Jones, Washington, D. C .:

Please use every available effort to defeat the Owen bill. It is fraught with great danger to the liberty of every American citizen. Medical freedom will be gone if any one particular school has a monopoly. Medical monopoly is the mainspring of the Owen bill.

R. COOPER WILLIS.

Then, also from Seattle—I take it that possibly to-morrow I will get a great many similar telegrams from some other locality in the State-I have the following telegram:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 15, 1912.

Hon. Wesley L. Jones.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The world is sound and moving on. Modern physiological pathologists by sheer merit are rapidly supplanting allopathic pretensions. In desperation allopaths are seeking to recover prestige through gag legislation and State medicine crushing with ignorant force on enlightened and aspiring people. For sake of truth and humanity, kill Owen bill.

DOCTOR P. RUDOLPH.

I also have a telegram from Spokane, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., April 15, 1912.

W. L. JONES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. G.:
The passage of the Owen bill as amended will deprive many of your best people of freedom. GEO. T. CRANE.

The ladies of my State are also getting fearful of this reactionary measure of my friend from Oklahoma. They say:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 15, 1912.

Poindexter and Jones.

Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

We look to you for the protection of our individual and national rights, hence the defeat of the Owen bill.

Mrs. Michael, Earles.

Mrs. MICHAEL EARLES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator, before he interrupts, whether it is his intention seriously to press this trust-breeding, monopolistic, liberty-destroying, tyrannical, reactionary measure against the wishes of the people of my State? I have a great deal of confidence in his liberty-loving proclivities, but I do feel | that in the matter of legislation at least I should pay some regard to the views of my people.

I have a great many more telegrams from people in my State with reference to this matter which I desire to submit, and I should like to know whether the Senator from Oklahoma seriously intends to press this measure which is fraught with so much danger to the people of my State.

Mr. OWEN. The bill itself abundantly answers the telegrams which have been read, and for the information of the Senator from Washington I will call his attention to this provision of the bill:

That the health service established by this act shall have no power to regulate the practice of medicine or the practice of healing, or to interfere with the right of a citizen to employ the practitioner of his choice, and all appointments made within the health service, including the head of the service, shall be made without discrimination in favor of or against any school of medicine or of healing.

The bill provides further that no domicile or residence of a person shall be entered without the consent of the occupant; that no function belonging exclusively to the State shall be exercised by the department. The opposition to this measure is inspired in large measure, in my opinion, by the same forces that have opposed the carrying out of the pure food and drug act in this country and by those who are engaged in disseminating patent medicines and who have a good deal of money invested in that business. They have stirred up innocent people, such as the Christian Scientists and some few members of the eclectics or the chiropractics or other citizens who imagine that their right to practice medicine or the healing art may be interfered with. Those artificial telegrams which are sent here—artificial in the sense that they are instituted by a private interpret serve po useful purpose account. stigated by a private interest-serve no useful purpose except perhaps to confuse the minds of those who do not understand what it really means.

I will say to the Senator from Washington that so far as I am concerned I do intend to press Senate bill No. 1 and to do whatever I can to establish a department of health in this country that shall make available, as far as possible, all the information acquired by the scientific world in regard to the preservation of human life.

vation of human life.

I remind the Senator from Washington that it was the investigation of Carroll, of Lazear, and of Agramonti and the other patriots of peace, a number of whom lost their lives in solving the problem of yellow fever at Habana, where the death rate was over 649 to the hundred thousand prior to the American occupancy, and rapidly fell to zero, which made possible the building of the Panama Canal, which the French nation had been unable to build because of yellow fever and because of the Charges fover. the Chagres fever.

I should like to know if in reality the Senator from Washington is opposed to the principle of this bill or whether he is merely diverting himself by reading these telegrams.

Mr. JONES. I wish the Senator from Oklahoma to know what my people think about this measure. I have not myself examined it very thoroughly, and am not now proposing to express any judgment with reference to it. I am glad to have the Senator's suggestion with reference to how these telegrams happened to come here. These people are certainly somewhat interested in the matter, because they paid at least a dollar apiece to get the telegrams here. So it is something serious to them, I do think on a matter of legislation-what it is wise to do in a legislative way here I should defer to the expression of opinion of my people, and these are the only expressions I have had in this way.

All these telegrams came in this morning. During the last session of Congress I got a great many telegrams of the same character. So that however they were inspired, and whoever brought about these telegrams, they must represent the senti-ments of these people and their fears; and I am glad to have the assurance of the Senator from Oklahoma that he does not the assurance of the Senator from Okianoma that he does not intend to deprive these people of their liberty and their freedom and that this is a good and meritorious measure. I assure him I shall look into it very carefully indeed, and if the results, after having done so, convince me that it is all that the Senator says it is, I shall possibly vote for it.

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Washington if he is in favor of an independent health service in the United States or

Mr. JONES. That is a matter I want to look into very carefully, having due regard for the views of my people.

Mr. OWEN. In other words, I understand the Senator from Washington to say that after this matter has been before the public three years actively he has not made up his mind upon it? Mr. JONES. No; the Senator does not understand me to say anything of the kind.

I have views on the general subject, but I have not been able to examine the particular features of the bill, and I do not desire, therefore, at this time to commit myself to any particular measure.

Mr. OWEN. I will ask the Senator from Washington if he recalls the language of the Republican national platform on this question.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; and I am a little bit surprised that, progressive as he is, the Senator finds something in the Republican platform which meets his approval. That to me is a little suspicious.

Mr. OWEN. I am unable to determine from anything the Senator says whether he is in favor of an independent health service or not, and I am willing to leave it in the Record that way if he is.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I suppose I am one of the innocent individuals who have been misled into the belief that this is undesirable legislation. I think I know pretty well the contents and the meaning of this bill and the forces that are behind it. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and I have given the bill a good deal of study.

A good many of the objectionable parts of the bill have been eliminated, and every effort has been made to make it just as innocent as possible. Nevertheless, it is a part of a system of legislation that is going on all over this country which is intended to establish a State medicine, and to place all the medical activities of the Government in the hands of one school of medicine; and this effort is properly characterized in the telegrams which have been read here in the Senate.

This particular bill is not so harmful in itself, but it is a part of the entire system of legislation about which we are complaining. I am not now going to discuss the merits of the bill. I expect to do so at the proper time when the bill comes before the Senate for consideration.

I desire to say in this connection, however, that it has been stated all over this country, just as it has been now stated on the floor of the Senate, that the opposition to this bill has been instigated and carried on by the patent-medicine men, and that other innocent people have been brought to believe it is harmful. That is an entire mistake, and in some quarters it is maliciously stated. The opposition to the bill is not carried on by the patent-medicine men. I do not know whether they are opposing it or not, but I know that the League for Medical Freedom, which comprises most of the opposition to the bill, has nothing to do with patent-medicine men. They have absolutely refused to accept any money from them. They are acting independently. Of course it is natural that the Christian Scientists, against whom most of this legislation is directed and who, in some of the States, under legislation now in force, are being prosecuted and imprisoned for carrying on their mode of healing, should stand opposed to legislation of this kind, and they are doing it consistently and in good faith.

The physicians of other schools of medicine are making the same opposition to it upon precisely the same grounds—that their liberty to practice their mode of healing, and the right of the people to resort to them for healing, will be affected by this legislation, if it is carried out as it is intended, not as appears on the face of the bill, but as it will be carried out and enforced throughout this whole country by legislation of this kind.

I am only saying this in order to attract the attention of the Senate to the fact that whatever objection is made to the bill, and which will be made on the floor of the Senate, will be made in good faith, without any selfish interest on the part of the patent-medicine men or anybody else.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I want to say that on March 22, 1912, I introduced a bill to establish a public-health service, and for other purposes, and when Senate bill No. 1 is up for consideration before the Senate, I intend to offer my bill as an amendment to the one reported to the Senate.

I will say that the bill provides that the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and all the other health agencies of the Government shall be put into the public-health service, and it will be under the Secretary of the Treasury, as the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service is to-day. There will be provided an assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose data it shall be to preside over this service.

duty it shall be to preside over this service.

I desire to say that it will reach the same result, in my opinion, as the bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma will reach. It will not entail another organization or another department, an independent department, and so far as the expense is concerned, there are only two additional employees from those in the public service to-day.

I sincerely trust that the Senate will compare the two bills and the organizations provided, and what is to be accomplished by the two, and I shall, as I said, offer this as a substitute for Senate bill No. 1 when it is up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegrams will lie on the table.

county of Dawson, State of Montana (Rept. No. 625); S. 6167. A bill to authorize the Williamson & Pond Creek Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Williamson, Mingo County, W. Va.

Big Sandy River at or near Williamson, Mingo County, W. Va. (Rept. No. 626); and
S. 6160. A bill to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, in the State of North Dakota (Rept. No. 627).

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1590) providing for an increase of salary for the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 628) thereon.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6219) providing for the purchase of permanent improvements on the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations by the citizens erecting such improvements, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 629) thereon.

LAND TITLES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. I present a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs recommending the passage of the bill (S. 6330) to adjust titles within the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, and for other purposes, with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 624) thereon. I should like to ask present consideration of the bill. It is a very short matter, but a matter of importance to the State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill, The Secretary. The amendment of the committee is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to validate by approval any instrument purporting to be a deed of conveyance or contract for title of allotted lands of the Five Civilized Tribes made prior to the removal of restrictions and before January 1, 1912, in the following cases, to wit:

First, When the purchase or contract was made in good faith, and no fraud was practiced, and the Indian allottee was actually paid the reasonable value of the land.

Second. When the purchase or contract was made in good faith and no fraud was practiced, but when the consideration paid was not sufficient to cover the reasonable value of the land conveyed: Provided, That in this class of cases the settlement can only be made upon the condition that the Secretary of the Interior be paid for the benefit of the allottee a sum sufficient to make up the reasonable value of such lands: Provided further, That the settlement in either case shall be made upon such terms of settlement as the Secretary may deem just, proper, and equitable, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon such settlement suit, if any, instituted at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be dismissed without cost to the defendant.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit the sale or exchange of the restricted land of any Indian and his helrs or legal representatives, the property so secured to be held for the use and benefit of such Indian, subject to the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions as imposed by law upon the original lands solid or exchange by the made for the benefit of said Indian and his helrs or legal representatives, the property so secured to be held for the use and benefit of such Indian, subject to the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions as imposed by law upon the original lands solid or exchanged

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand it, the bill the Senator from Oklahoma offers as an amendment is one prepared by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Adams, Mr. OWEN. It is.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator offers it as a substitute for the pending bill?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Is any part of the main bill left? The Senator will excuse me for asking the question, but I was not present in the committee.

Mr. OWEN. The first part of the bill is repeated in the substitute. This additional amendment was proposed by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS. The question I asked is whether the amendment which was read at the desk is offered as a substitute for the bill on the calendar.

Mr. OWEN. It is. Mr. CURTIS. If so, I have no objection to its consideration. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that everything after the enacting clause of the bill is stricken out by the

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not yet upon the calen-

Mr. HEYBURN. That makes it rather more radical. I thought it was on the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that it was a calendar bill. think myself it had better be printed so that Senators may see what it is.

HEYBURN. I got the impression from the question asked by the Senator from Kansas that it was a calendar bill and that the committee was merely proposing to amend it.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I understood.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, then, it is a calendar bill now. The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having just been reported it has not yet gone to the calendar. The Senator from Oklahoma has asked that it do not go to the calendar, but remain on

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it may go to the calendar. For one I want to give some consideration to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PROTECTION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER LEVEES.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably the bill (H. R. 23246) appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of maintaining and protecting against the impending flood the levees on the Mississippi River and rivers tributary thereto, and I submit a report (No. 622) thereon. structed by the committee to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $300,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the purpose of maintaining and protecting against the impending flood the levees on the Mississippi River and rivers tributary thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment

Mr. HEYBURN. I think there is a word which should be changed. This is not an impending flood any more. The flood is over. As I understand it, this is merely taking care of the people who have suffered by the flood. Is not that true?

Mr. PERCY. It has nothing to do with taking care of the people who have suffered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely asked the question whether it is not an appropriation to take care of those who have already suffered. The floods, I understand, no longer exist.

Mr. NELSON. It is not to take care of them otherwise than to mend certain crevasses in the levees temporarily. It is to meet an impending danger from the crevasses.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was an impending danger, and the word "impending" undoubtedly described it correctly when the bill was first introduced.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the word "impending" will be stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was proper, it is true, when the bill was introduced, but the conditions now have passed.

Mr. NELSON. The bill was sent in on the suggestion of the President in a special message. It was prepared in the department as showing what they recommend. I think under it they have ample power to relieve the immediate needs in reference to the levees. It does not relate to the distribution of food or supplies, but is simply to repair certain breaks in the levees and crevasses which have occurred; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. According to the language of the bill it is an appropriation for the improvement of the levees of the river. The immediate danger having passed, the money to be used for the purpose of repairing damages done amounts to an approthe purpose of repairing damages done amounts to an appropriation for the improvement of the river, and it belongs more properly in the river and harbor bill. If you strike out the word "impending," then the money would only be expended to repair damages already existing,

Mr. PEROY. Mr. President, the Senator is under a misapprehension about the language of the bill as well as the scope of the bill. The flood is an impending flood. The damages operators are supported to the control of the bill.

of the bill. The flood is an impending flood. The danger has not at all passed. No part of the appropriation is intended either to aid flood sufferers or to repair present crevasses in The flood is almost at its crest; there are about 1,100 miles of levee line; and this money is an additional appropriation to the $350,000 appropriated within the past week, of which $310,000 has been expended. It is to fight the high water and try to preserve the Government levees which are in peril, a peril which has not passed at all, but the peril increases with the length of time that the river at flood presses against the embankments. The river at Cairo is to-day 2 feet higher than the highest flood ever known, and it is higher down the entire levee system than was ever known before. It is a life and death fight to preserve those levees. It is for that purpose that this appropriation goes and not for any permanent leves work, and it does not belong in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WARREN. Let the bill be again read so that we may know how it reads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HEYBURN. No one knows what is impending. know what has occurred. I am in thorough sympathy with the appropriation covering all the necessities growing out of the occurrences, but when you use the word "impending" there it looks only to the future in a conjectural way. We should meet the emergency, and I am in thorough sympathy with it, but the word "impending" should not be in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the Senator to move to strike it out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to strike out the word." impending." Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I regard that amendment as wholly unnecessary. Striking out that word will necessitate the bill going back to the House and delay somewhat its passage. The flood is still impending. The river is still at high water and the crevasses are existing. The object is to repair those crevasses and give immediate relief.

The Committee on Commerce have under consideration the river and harbor bill, and there is an appropriation in that bill, which the committee will perhaps increase, for the permanent improvement of the levee system of the Mississippi River. This bill has passed the House, and I think it is in a condition in which it ought to be passed in the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would inquire when it passed the House. Mr. NELSON and Mr. PERCY. Yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On yesterday.

Mr. NELSON. It is a case of emergency which was communicated by a special message from the President of the United States, and, as I understand, the bill was really formulated in the department.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think I was here-I believe I was-when the message came in from the President of the United States reciting the conditions existing there. care nothing for the recommendations of the department, for we are to act on our own responsibility here and not on that of the department.

My only objection to the use of the word "impending" was that it would be an appropriation not for protecting against floods, because these floods come but once a year. doubtless the high-water flood that comes annually from the melting of the snows on the upper rivers. That does not recur during the year. If it has made breaks in the levers, they are a proper subject for consideration by the committee and the Congress in connection with the river and harbor bill, and they should be amply provided for, but when you talk about "impending," you mean something that is yet to come.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does the Senator know how far or about how far above New Orleans the crest of this flood now is?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been reading every day about it during my absence.

Mr. SHIVELY. I understand the flood is now 500 miles above New Orleans. It is certainly impending.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.
Mr. NELSON. The crevasses, which are immediately endangering the valley basins of the Mississippi River, are at Lake Providence and one farther up the river. The water passing through those two crevasses, which are on the west side of the river, passes into what is known as the Tensas Basin, which extends clear down to the mouth of the Red River and the Atchafalaya, and threatens the whole valley, not only the Tensas Basin, but the Atchafalaya Valley and the lower Teche country. This is simply for immediate relief, to stop these gaps. The rivers and harbors bill will provide for future emergencies.

Mr. HEYBURN. If they exist, the word "impending" is not applicable; and if they do not exist, the word "impending" is onjectural. I merely wanted to call attention to it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to read from the message of the President of the United States of yesterday with reference to this matter, in which he said:

The crest of the flood is now reaching the lower portion of the Mississippi where the country is flatter, and where the danger to the levees is at least as great as above, and where the damage and loss to persons and property, if crevasses occur, will be far greater than on the upper river, necessitating even a greater amount of relief work than that already incurred.

So the danger is impending.

Mr. HEYBURN. I read in yesterday's newspaper the reports doubtless upon which the President acted, and I have been receiving, through the courtesy of some publishers of the standard papers, marked copies of the papers describing the floods, with pictures of the water, and its connection with the towns, and have given some attention to it out of a natural sympathy and some personal acquaintance with those who have been communicating with me here. My sympathies are all with any measure to relieve those people, but my sympathies are not with a proposition that involves an anticipation of the repair of works where the damage has already been done. The picture-I think it was of Memphis-represented 13 feet of water up over the front of the houses, and that some of the houses had broken loose from their moorings and were floating away. That was in yesterday's dispatches; and 24 hours—I think Senators from that section of the country will bear me out in saying—24 hours makes a wonderful difference in the height of water. It will drop 6 feet in 24 hours without any particular excitement, and it will rise 6 feet within 24 hours.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is scarcely as accurate as he usually is when he takes exception to the employment of the word "impending" in the connection in which it is used in this proposed act. It is a descriptive word, intended to describe the existing flood. The word "existing" would be a better word than "impending." It is used in that sense, and the context explains exactly the connection in which it is used, and develops perfectly the particular connection in which the money is to be employed. The fleed is pending. The writer of the bill used the word "imfleed is pending. pending." I do no I do not know that I am sufficiently advised of the difference between the meaning of the two words to make a choice between them, but there is certainly no choice between them or any other synonym which would justify the delay in the passage of this bill a single minute. It will not enlarge the uses to which the money can be devoted, nor would it otherwise compensate for the delay involved in it. If a thing of this character is to be done, it ought to be done quickly. Whilst I would not say that the Senator is hypercritical, I believe, if he will read the bill over again, he will be more than delighted to withdraw his objection.

I merely heard the bill read from the desk. The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn], to strike out the word "impending."

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate and bearing upon the question to be taken up to-morrow, the bill regulating immigration, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD certain data which I send to the desk, including a statement of the governor of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted as requested.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask what the request was? Mr. OVERMAN. To have printed certain data in the RECORD in regard to the immigration bill that comes up to-morrow.

Mr. ROOT. Very well.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Herald, Apr. 15, 1912.]

EW YORK SUFFERS MOST FROM DEFECTIVE ALLENS—WEAKLINGS STOP HERE, ASSERTS DR. GEORGE B. CAMPBELL, HEAD OF STATE COMMISSION OF DEPORTATION, AND CONTAMINATE HEALTH AND MORALS OF THE CITY—SAYS THAT MUNICIPALITY SHOULD LEAD FIGHT—ONLY SMALL, PERCENTAGE OF IMMIGRANTS ARE EXCLUDED.

Large and constant increase of the number of aliens committed as defectives to the State hospitals of New York is attributed by State officials to increasing difficulties in returning such persons to their native lands, as well as to increasing pressure by the Governments and relatives of the aliens to gain admission here for them. The Federal statistics of rejection of immigrants show the following:

Cause of rejection.	1907	1908	1909	1910	1911
Idiots Imbeciles. Feeble-minded Insanity, including epileptics. Likely to become a public charge, including beggars and parpers. Physically or mentally defective.	29 189 6,866	20 45 121 184 3,741 870	18 42 121 167 4,458 370	16 40 125 198 15,927 312	12 26 126 144 12,048 3,055

The number of immigrants excluded for the above and other causes in 1914 was 23.249, or about 2.1 per cent of the total seeking admission.

"New York is the first and greatest sufferer by any break in the barriers Congress has erected to exclude from America the diseased, insane, and defective of other countries," said Dr. George B. Campbell, chalman of the State Commission of Deportation, vesterday in discussing the overcrowding of Ellis Island and the admission of thousands who would be turned back under normal conditions of examination there. "The tide of immigration sweeps into and through New York, the able-bodied aliens distributing themselves to their own and the country's advantage all over the various States. The weakings lag and few ever get beyond New York.

"The class that gains admission to this country when the rigidity of inspection is relaxed is the most dangerous to our national health. The feeble-minded and the epileptics and the defectives, whose condition requires more than superficial examination for discovery, are the ones who slip into the United States in times of relaxed inspection. They are the greatest menace to the health and morals of the community. They are the defectives who marry and discountry. He had to live on food he brought with him, sleeping upon his own bedding, and carling for himself in every way through the long ocean trip. When he acrived he had to shift for himself.

"Much suffering doubtless resulted, but the material result was the acquisition by the United States of new citizens who became valuable to the country.

"Not so now. The increased care and comfort for the immigrant has naturally encouraged the weaklings to emigrate to America. Warm-hearted benevolence is exhibited by a thousand societies for the protection and care of the very classes which would not be admitted if the recruiting of an industrial army were the guiding principle of our immigrant on policy, and not the opening of the land of liberty to all who seek her shores.

"New York must take the lead and the subsidies granted to trans-Atlantic steamship lines by foreign Governments. All are encouraged to migrate to America, but no defectives are permitted to return who can by any device be prevented from so doing.

"Commissioner Williams has the cordial support of the New York State departments that have official relations with him. His administration is generally regarded as one of the most efficient that the Federal Immigration Service has ever seen, but he is seriously handl-capped. There is lack of room at Ellis Island, the corps of officials is numerically insufficient, and this applies especially to the medical examiners. When several steamships come in together, and the rush is on to get the immigrants through Ellis Island, the medical officers there have to inspect 150 persons every 5 minutes to keep the gangway clear and avert chaotic congestion. Adequate inspection for climination of the unfit is impossible in those conditions.

"Twice the present accommodations and twice the present force at Ellis Island would not be more than enough for the work that must be done there if It is to be done as the law directs that it shall be done. And again I would say it is New York that is most interested in seeing that it is done properly."

Statement of Gov. Joha A. Dix, of New York, that appeared in most of the New York dallies January 24, 1912:

"This State has a very serious problem in regard to the care of the insane," said Gov. Dix to-night. "We have in our State hospitals about 34,000 Insane patients, and there is an increase of about 100 a month, which is out of all proportion to the increase in the population of the State. This abnormal increase in the number of insane is due to the large number of foreign born who, in many cases, develop insanity soon after they have been admitted to the country.

"The annual cost in New York of maintaining the insane is about $5,000,000, and 46 per cent of the population of the hospitals for the insane are of foreign birth. I have become convinced that something should be done to make more effective the examination of persons about to enter this country so that we may be protected from the entrance of those who are likely to become a public burden. New York State must be protected from the undesirables. That is my reason for taking up this matter with the National Government.

"The last report of the New York State Beard of Allenists (1911) shows the situation very clearly as to the mercenary use that is being made of this country by the foreign stemmship companies in their report '1,126 insane allens and nonresidents were removed from the State hospitals or returned to the communities responsible for their care and maintenance last year."

Address by president taff (S. Doc. No. 568).

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT TAFT (S. DOC. NO. 568).

Mr. SMOOT. I ask to have printed as a Senate document an address delivered by President Taft before the alumni of Howard University, at the Metropolitan African Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., April 9, 1912. The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the prayer of the House be granted, and the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to: and the Vice President appointed Mr. CURTIS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TILLMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5382.

Mr. BACON. I trust the Senator from Utah will not press that motion. If the Senator desires the Senate to take up the bill for the purpose of making a speech or for the purpose of enabling any other Senator to make a speech, I shall have no objection at all to it. But I respectfully repeat to the Senator what I suggested yesterday.

My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is very much interested in this matter. He spoke yesterday and gave notice that he desired to be present and to take part in the further discussion of the bill, and for it now to be taken up, when he is necessarily absent from the Chamber and will be for two days, possibly three days, I am not sure-I think he will be back on the third day-I think is hardly fair. Of course, if it be taken up upon this motion as now presented, and no one wishes to speak upon it, it will be in order to be voted upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no desire to press this bill in the absence of the Senator from Georgia or in the absence of any Senator interested in it; but I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I gave notice originally that I would ask the Senate to take up the bill a week ago yesterday, and at the request of Senators interested in other matters and for various reasons I consented to let the matter go over until yesterday, and I fear that these requests will keep coming along in the future and that we will not be able to dispose of this measure at the present session.

I will make this suggestion to the Senator from Georgia: I am only anxious that this measure shall be voted upon at this session of Congress, and I will ask unanimous consent that on a week from next Thursday-I do not know the calendar dayimmediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill and that a vote be taken upon the bill and all amendments pending and to be offered before adjournment on that legislative day. If there is no-

Mr. BACON. Possibly if my colleague were here he would agree to it; I know of nothing to the contrary; but I do not see any necessity for such unusual haste in the matter. There is immediate prospect of an adjournment of the Senate, and it is not as if we were in a short session, when we must adjourn on a certain day. If a majority of the Senate are in favor of this bill, they will certainly have an opportunity to take a vote It could not possibly be postponed, if a Senator desired it. It is not a bill of that class where a Senator is going to take any unusual or unused methods by which to postpone it. only time when methods of that kind are resorted to are when something absolutely vital is pending which Senators feel they have the right to oppose by every known method. Such an instance arises only once in a decade. I have very seldom seen during my term of service here any such effort made. It is extremely rare, and there is no possibility of it in this case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to suggest to him that within the next few days the appropriation bills will be coming in for consideration, various tariff bills that have been under consideration will be before the Senate, and there is some danger of a measure of this kind being crowded out of consideration. I am only anxious to have a vote.

Mr. BACON. I can not understand the nervous apprehension of the Senator. The present bill has been but a very short time before the Senate. I see no reason to apprehend anything of the kind. All I am asking is that the Senator shall wait two or three days until my colleague returns, and then probably we will be in a position to consider the suggestion of the Senator and to fix a date for taking up the bill and proceeding with it; but that should not be done in the absence of my colleague when his very great interest in the matter is known.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to say that there are some other Senators besides the Senator's colleague, for whom I have the highest respect, who are interested in this bill. I should like to present some telegrams and make a few remarks about it my-self. I do not see why I should be cut off because the Senator from Georgia happens to be absent.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is either setting up a man of straw and fighting it or else he did not hear what I said.

Mr. LODGE. I think I heard what the Senator said. Mr. BACON. The Senator was present, and I suppose he heard it.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I heard it.

Mr. BACON. I said that if the bill was taken up for discussion I had no objection to make, but that if taken up generally without such announcement, if nobody was ready to speak, it would be in order to vote upon it. Probably the Senator heard

Mr. LODGE. There is going to be some debate on the bill, as everybody knows. It seems to me that neither the Senator from Utah nor the Senator from Georgia can undertake to say what the Senate shall do with the bill if it sees fit to take it up and discuss it.

Mr. BACON. I only wanted to be protected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was asked. The motion itself was not made.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to take it up is not debatable. Mr. SUTHERLAND. My request was for unanimous consent,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah made no such motion.

Mr. LODGE The motion is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not a debatable question; but the question has not been raised and the Chair did not raise it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Presiding Officer to put my request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Utah—
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks to have his request put to the Senate, and the question has been raised that debate is not in order on a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill. So the Chair wanted to dispose of the request in the affirmative or negative and then put the motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. If yea or nay must be said now, I object, but I do not want to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Utah that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not made a motion yet. asked unanimous consent, and the Chair so stated correctly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Utah did make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is mistaken. Mr. CULBERSON. And afterwards, in a colloquy with the Senator from Georgia, a unanimous-consent proposition was made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Texas is mistaken.

I asked to have the bill taken up.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let us have the notes. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not move that the bill be taken up; but pending that—

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to have the notes.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah says he does not make the motion anyway; so the question would not be-before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator wants to take up the bill simply for discussion, not for the purpose of acting on it to-day

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no intention of having it acted on to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator wishes to take up the bill to make a speech on it, so it will not be taken up section by section to-day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have said repeatedly that I have no intention of asking for a vote on the bill or any provision of it to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understood the Senator to say, and I desired that that should go into the RECORD to make it clear. I think when the bill is considered regularly it ought to be taken up section by section and each section considered. I do not know whether the bill has been read or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has not been read.

Mr. OVERMAN. It ought to be read for information. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah now to consider the bill which has been under discussion informally?

Mr. BACON. I have no objection, with the statement made by the Senator from Utah, but my objection was distinctly based upon the ground that unless some such statement was made the bill would be in order to be voted upon. That is the only objection I have had to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that no objection is made to the request of the Senator from Utah, and the Senate has the bill under consideration as in Committee of the Whole,

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5382) to provide an exclusive remedy and compensation for accidental injuries, resulting in disability or death, to employees of common carriers by railroads engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the bill is read for action on the committee amendments I desire to submit some observations upon the bill. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to put in the RECORDand I will not read them, if the Senate will grant me permission to put them in the RECORD-some brief letters and telegrams which I have received from the locomotive engineers, the railroad trainmen, and railroad conductors of my State. I know some of the writers of the letters and senders of the telegrams. I need hardly say that the organizations are made up of men of a very high standard of efficiency and character and conduct. They are not men to come and ask for extravagant or unreasonable legislation. I think the bill they are now asking for is one of the most important measures that has been before Congress in many years. I think it would be of very great benefit. and I know that I am speaking for the railroad men of my State when I say that they are very anxious to have this bill disposed of at the earliest possible moment. They do not want to see it beaten or eaten up with amendments.

I ask that the letters and telegrams may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As a great many of your constituents in Massachusetts are railroad men, who are greatly interested in these bills which are of great interest and value to those who are so unfortmate as to be injured in the service of the railroad, I ask that you give these bills your earnest consideration.

Thanking you in advance for the favor we have asked, I am, Sincerely, yours,

Dear Senator: On behalf of the locomotive engineers of Massachusetts I most carnestly ask for your support on House bill 20487 (Senate bill 5382)—Federal accident compensation bill. We believe this to be the most important legislation that has come up in years for the injured railroad employee. Knowing well the interest you have taken in behalf of the railroad employees in the past, we feel that your influence will give the bill great prestige.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINME: Lowell, Mass., April 5, 1912.

Senator Henry Cabor Lodge, Washington, D. C.

Senator Henry Carot Lode, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: This is to call your favorable attention to the "Federal compensation act," introduced in the Senate as S. 5382 by Senator Suthkeland, who was chairman of the "Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Committee," authorized by joint resolution 41, approved June 25, 1910, and in the House as H. R. 20487, by Representative Brantley, vice chairman of the committee.

The Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate have had this bill under consideration for some time, and I am glad to state that on Monday, April I, it was ordered favorably reported.

We are advised that some of the Senators and Congressmen have expressed the opinion that railroad employees were not interested in the passage of the proposed law, and I take this opportunity of respectfully correcting that erroneous opinion.

There is every evidence of intense interest being displayed on the part of railroad employees in this State. Taking into consideration the fact that from the years 1905 to 1909, inclusive, 77,334 was the average number injured and 3,568 the average number killed in the United States, it can readily be seen that the passage of this proposed law is of vital importance to all men employed in railroad service.

Under the common-law system of employers' liability, based upon negligence, with its defenses of contributory negligence, fellow-servant fault, assumption of risk, etc., an injured employee is virtually compelled to accept what compensation is offered him by the railroad company, the cost of litigation absorbing the recovery.

It is generally conceded that this law is somewhat antiquated, and, although probably adequate at the time of its inception, it does not meet the requirements of existing conditions.

In fatalities the same conditions obtain as in injuries, for the reason that a dead man is, at best, but an indifferent witness; and the impression seems to be abroad among the men that in giving evidence favorable to the plaintiff your job is being jeopardized.

the widows', orphans', and cripples' money, which sum, when this law becomes effective, will go directly to the beneficiaries.

This letter has the approval of the 120 members of Spindle City Lodge, No. 233, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Hoping and trusting that you will give this matter prompt and undivided attention, and thanking you in advance for your favorable consideration and support, I am,

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I understand his announcement of purpose in regard to a vote covers the amendments as well as the bill. The Senator does not propose to take up the amendments for voting to-day? Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will not ask for a vote on the bill or any amendment to-day The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will pro-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have no intention today of entering into a discussion of the various details of the bill. I intend, as briefly as possible, to discuss the principles which are involved in the bill and such provisions of the bill as affect its general character, leaving the discussion of details until we come to consider the bill by sections.

On June 25, 1910, the Congress of the United States passed an act providing for the appointment of a commission to thoroughly investigate the subject of employers' liability and workmen's compensation, and to report to Congress through the President at an early date, and in their report to suggest such legislation as in their judgment would meet the evils of the present system of employers' liability.

That commission was made up by the appointment of two Members of the Senate, two Members of the House of Representatives, and two lay members to be appointed directly by the President. The commission, as originally constituted, by reason of the failure of some members of it to be reelected to the House and to the Senate, was changed so that the membership was rearranged about the month of April, 1911.

On May 10, 1911, the commission as reorganized began public hearings. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the character of those hearings, so that it may be seen that the commission has given thorough consideration to this subject; has heard all persons and all parties interested, not only those who represent the employers' side of the question and those who represent the employees' side of the question, but also the general public.

The first series of hearings were called to consider the constitutionality of any proposed legislation dealing with the subject, because it was felt by the commission that it was necessary first of all to determine within what field legislation of this character could be enacted; in other words, to determine how far we could go under the provisions of the Constitution before we undertook to go at all. Those hearings were held on four separate days, May 10, 14, 15, and 16. The question of the constitutionality of the proposed legislation was fully discussed; and as a result of it result of it the commission was unanimously of the opinion that we have power to enact legislation of this character within the provisions of the Constitution.

Then a series of hearings were held, lasting several days, to discuss the general practical questions involved; that is, the general nature of the legislation which was proposed to be

After those hearings had been completed the commission held a number of executive sessions for the purpose of formulating certain general principles which it was proposed should be submitted to those interested, and upon those general propositions another series of hearings were held.

After those hearings had been completed, the commission, being in session day after day for several weeks, prepared a tentative draft of a bill, and that tentative draft was sent far and wide throughout the country. The commission sent out for each of these various hearings no less than 30,000 invitations, addressed to the local organizations of railroad men in every part of the United States and to others. At the meetings held there were present lawyers and a large number of the heads of the various railroad organizations, together with men who were employees of railroads but who were not holding official positions. There were present many men representing the railroad employers' side of the question, members of State commissions, college professors, and lawyers of note who had given thorough study and consideration to this question.

As a result of those various hearings, and after thorough consideration of the whole subject, and after the commission had considered the various compensation laws that had been passed in other countries, together with those which had been adopted in a few of the States of the Union, together with the result of the investigations of the various State commissions, this tentative bill was finally completed. That bill was then submitted to the President of the United States, who transmitted it to Congress with a message approving it. The bill was then introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was there fully considered, several days at different times being devoted to the subject, and finally the bill was reported as amended by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Jones in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator state the attitude of the leaders of these labor organizations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I intend to state that in just a moment. I have made this statement thus far, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing that this whole subject, the details of this proposed legislation, has had the most thorough consideration, that it is the result of the best thought of the commission, and the commission after such consideration has reported the bill as its unanimous solution of this problem.

I have already stated, Mr. President, that there were present at the various hearings these railroad employees and the officers of these various organizations. As the Members of the Senate know, there are four great organizations of railroad employees in this country. Three of those, through their chief officers, their presidents, have indorsed this bill for their organizations. They have asked that it be enacted as it is presented. The chief of one of the organizations, and one of them only, appeared before the commission and objected to the bill, but since that objection was made he has stated, as I shall show in a moment, that while he does not join with his brother officers in asking that the bill be passed, he does not at the present time antagonize it; he simply occupies a neutral position.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to read briefly the statements of some of these officers with reference to this subject.

First of all, I call attention to the statement of Mr. W. G. Lee, who is president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of the United States. Mr. Lee came before the commission and spoke for that entire membership of over 100,000 railroad trainmen.

At page 643 I call attention to what he said. This statement was made before the tentative bill had been drafted. Mr. Lee said:

I wish to go on record at this time as unqualifiedly favoring a work-men's compensation act as a result of resolutions passed by the last two biennial conventions of our organizations. Just what form will be most satisfactory to both employer and employee is a question, but we believe that as far as possible litigation should stop as between the employee and employer. We believe that whatever money is disbursed by the employer should go to those disabled and not a large proportion or percentage to attorneys or others, as is the case at present.

At a later date Mr. Lee said:

The Brotherhood of Trainmen, with its 120,000 members, favor and will defend anywhere and any time abolishing the first two weeks' payment if it brings the proper relief to those to whom this money is intended.

On March 26, 1912, referring to the bill now pending, Mr. Lee, speaking before the House Judiciary subcommittee, said:

speaking before the House Judiciary subcommittee, said:

I can say that a great majority of the members of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen are in accord with the principles of the law. They have expressed their desire for it at their convention and have gone on record in favor of certainty of benefits to take the place of uncertainty of litigation. We believe in doing everything for the benefit of the greatest number, and for this reason we do not point to the high verdicts that are received in exceptional cases as a basis for a compensation law. We realize the impossibility of paying the amount awarded by the exceptional verdict where the employer is absolutely at fault to all cases of injury or death, whether caused by the fault of the employee or the fault of the employee. In behalf of my organization I trust that your committee will see fit to report the bill to your respective assemblies as it has come to you from the compensation commission.

Mr. Sines, who was the vice president and treasurer of the Railroad Trainmen, indorsed the bill in language which will be found in the hearings, at page 1323, all of which I shall not stop to read, but will read the concluding sentence, which is:

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that from the standpoint of my organization, although we believe and feel that the provision, in so far as it covers the number of years is concerned, should be extended, it will have the support of my organization as an organization.

Mr. Garretson, president of the Order of Railway Conductors, representing 48,000 men, indersed the bill, and at page 1324

As the matter has progressed and as the efforts of the commission have crystallized, I have recognized the absolute impossibility of reconciling the variety of beliefs that were held in regard to these questions, for every man insisted that he alone had received the light on the subject. Therefore, my attitude in regard to the bill as proposed is one not only of appreciation of the efforts of the commission and the work you have done, but of gradual extensions of the bill as a whole.

Then, further on, he says:

I am willing to surrender my broader ideas in regard to many of those provisions, and to give, along with the organization which I represent, cordial support to the report of the commission as it will be formulated.

And in conclusion, after saying that he thought the bill was peculiarly well framed to meet the wide scope that will come between the highest paid man in any service and the lowest paid man that may serve any employer, Mr. Garretson said:

I can say this for these three organizations: That every consistent aid that can be given in enacting into law the findings of this commission will be given, and I believe that I am justified in saying for all three that you can have the best that they can furnish.

Mr. W. E. Stone; vice president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, representing 69,739 men, indorsed the proposed measure. He said:

Speaking as the chief executive of the engineers, I want to say that your bill is going to have the support of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. We are going to do everything we can to have it enacted into law. But there has got to be a campaign of education.

Then further on he said .

Gentlemen, I want to say to you that the bill is even broader in many lines than I ever expected we would be able to get, and I think an expression of the thanks of the employees of this country is due to this commission for the broad and liberal spirit in which it has met the various interests and combined them in the tentative draft of this bill. But I also feel that the majority of the men throughout the country never will know one-half of the labor that was necessary on the part of you gentlemen.

Arthur E. Holder, legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor, which organization has within its ranks railroad employees aggregating 924,606 men-nearly a million railroad employees-indorsed the principle of compensation in the strongest possible terms. Mr. Holder, representing 66 per cent of all the railroad men of the country, had been sent to England, prior to the consideration by our commission of this question, for the purpose of studying the operation of the English compensation act. After devoting some time to the study of the question there at first hand, talking with the various employees, he returned to this country, came before our commission, indorsed the compensation scheme as opposed to the employers' liability plan in the most positive terms, and declared himself for the general principles of the plan which had been suggested by the commission as will be found at page 923 of the hearings. I shall not stop to read it, Mr. President, but shall ask leave to insert the statement in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The statement referred to is as follows:

In the first place, I want to say that the men whom I, directly and indirectly, represent want the compensation principle established. We are not going to be too insistent upon conditions. We believe that it is one of the growths of civilization, one of the advanced movements to protect humanity, and we believe that when this principle is once established in the United States that it will not be long before the intelligence of the people will find all the ways needed to make the act applicable to every requirement. It is not for the sake of getting pelf or money that we want the compensation principle established; that is a secondary point. We want the principle established, Mr. Chairman, for the sake of saving pain and suffering and unnecessary neglect, that we think that in this advanced age of the twentieth century there is little occasion for. And we hope that by the penalties attached to a compensation bill many hands and many feet may be left upon men, who might otherwise be unnecessarily maimed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In addition to Mr. Holder Mr.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In addition to Mr. Holder, Mr. Gompers, who is president of the American Federation of Labor, appeared before our commission and indorsed the main features of the tentative outline that we made prior to preparing the bill and specifically indorsed what is called the National Civic Federation bill, which, in its general lines, is the same as the bill now pending before the Senate. I will call attention to his statement, without stopping to read it, and ask permission to insert it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission

is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

We believe that the bill which has become known as the American Federation of Labor bill, or the National Civic Federation bill, is the one which is the best for general purposes for the Federal Government, and which it could and ought to enact. (P. 874.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mind my asking you one or two questions about these other features of the bill? I don't know whether you have thought about them You have not told us what you think about the provision for making the law compulsory. Have you thought about that feature?

Mr. GOMPERS, I should say that the law ought to be compulsory.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, it ought to be a system complete in itself, excluding the common-law remedy and the common-law defenses?

Mr. Gompers. I would rather see all who were injured and their dependents fairly cared for than to have one get a large verdict or a large amount and the remainder fritter away their time in litigation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. H. E. Wills, assistant grand chief engineer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and joint national representative of the conductors, trainmen, and engineers, has indorsed the bill upon a number of occasions in the most positive terms. I will ask permission to insert some statements from him in the RECORD, without stopping to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The matter referred to is as follows:

Now, there are a good many other things that I know ought to be said, and I do not want to take any more of your time except to say that I was associated to quite an extent with some of those who were parties to the framing of the joint resolution that was introduced into the House and the Senate asking for the appointment of this commission. There was a time when I felt considerably discouraged over the prospects, but I can not find words now to express my gratification at what has been accomplished by those who have been handling this matter. I wish that every railway man, or employee, could understand just what has been done and how it has been done. I wish that they could have been present even at the hearings. Even then they would have known, I believe, but little of the real work that has had to be done to bring about what we have before us at the present time in the way of a bill. I think if they could fully understand what has been done at these hearings they would appreciate the hard work, the care, and the responsibility that the commission has been beset with, and would appreciate it, and I wish to express my individual gratification and satisfaction and appreciation of what has been accomplished. (P. 1316.)

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And at the hearing before the House committee on March 26, 1912, Mr. Wills said:

Senator SUTHERLAND. You are thoroughly familiar with this legisla-

Senator Sutherland. You are thoroughly familiar with this legislation proposed here?

Mr. Wills. Yes, sir.

Senator Sutherland. I wish you would state to the committee whether or not you are in favor of it.

Mr. Wills. I am most heartily in favor of it. I believe it to be one of the greatest pieces of legislation in the interest of our workingmen that has been introduced for years. I went into it with a great deal of care, with a great deal of caution and timidity at first, and, as I say, I was one of many who were instrumental in asking for the resolution that was introduced creating this commission that we might have publicity and have a chance to discuss and know all of the details of what it meant. In my report, as I tell you, which I will be glad to submit to you, I have stated to our membership that it is one of the most important things that to-day confronts the railroad employees of this country. I believe the principle to be right and just and sound in every detail, but I am not satisfied with all of the details. The principle is sound, but I am not satisfied with all of the details. The principle is sound, but I am not satisfied in all respects with the provisions of the bill, but I have no complaints to make. We have been heard patiently and in full, and I wish to say with a great deal of pleasure that, as has been stated here, I was sent to England and Germany by the four organizations, not to get information from the Government, not to get information from the employer, but to get first-hand information from the beneficiaries under their laws. I spent that time and gave the matter consideration, and I am thoroughly satisfied that the bill as drawn will do the greatest amount of good that is possible for a bill to do at this time.

As before stated, the only head of any of these organiza-

As before stated, the only head of any of these organizations who has been heard before the commission opposing this legislation was Mr. W. S. Carter, president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. Mr. Carter, however, as I have already said, at present occupies a position of neutral-I desire to call attention very briefly to a statement made by Mr. Dixon, the general attorney for that brotherhood, a few days ago before the subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Dixon said:

Mr. Carter, whom I represent, he being away at this time, gave me explicit instructions when I came to this city not to interfere, not to oppose, and not to help the passage of this bill. Mr. Carter assured the three representatives of the other organizations that his position would be one of absolute neutrality, that while the bill did not meet with his approval he would put no obstacle in the way of its passage.

So that it is seen finally that the heads of all of the rallroad organizations of the country, representing in the aggregate 1,700,000 railroad employees, with the exception of one, have affirmatively indorsed this bill, are affirmatively behind the provisions of this bill, and are affirmatively anxious that this bill in its present form shall pass at this session of Congress, and the only one who is opposed to it is now occupying a position of neutrality.

In that connection I call attention to a statement made by Mr. Lewis, a Member of the House of Representatives, at page 67 of the House hearings; and I may say, by way of preface, that Mr. Lewis was himself in his younger days a coal miner, a man who has been associated with the laboring men all his life. During the past 15 or 20 years Mr. Lewis has been giving the most careful study and consideration to this question. He had presented to the House a bill upon this same subject which he had prepared and which was before our commission, and Mr. Lewis, after his broad study of this question—and I think he is as well informed upon it as any man in the country-has this to say:

A cursory view of the statistics of railway accidents in the United States shows that about 100,000 accidents happen to employees annually—that is, nearly 2,000 happen every week. In my experience not 10 per cent of those cases now are the subjects of compensation. A week's delay, then, means 1,700 or 1,800 cripples or the dependents of dead men that go without any kind of compensation, although compensation is now provided from Gibraltar to the islands of Greece. I do not know any subject relating to labor that has been any more thoroughly and generally discussed in this country than this compensation subject in the last two or three years. I say the time has some to not pensation subject in the last two or three years. I say the time has come to act.

Speaking for the railroad men, particularly in the State of Maryland, and I might say especially in my own district, what now is desirable, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, is that this committee report this bill and place it before Congress for its action. If it is not done with considerable expedition, I fear that two years will have been lost, and 200,000 of these victims will go, as they have gone for the last generation, utterly without help or utterly without their rights in the premises.

I therefore most carnestly insist that this committee take the most immediate action possible with this measure and lay it before the Houses for their final action.

And again:

And again;

Senator Sutherland. Mr. Lewis, will you tell the committee how many years you have been investigating this subject?

Mr. Lewis. The subject came under my notice through the publications of the Labor Bureau of the Government. I have been working upon it ever since.

Senator Sutherland. How long has that been?

Mr. Lewis. That would be about 14 years.

Senator Sutherland. You were the author of a bill on this subject that was introduced into the Maryland Legislature many years ago, were you not?

Mr. Lewis. Yes, sir.

Senator Sutherland. That bill was passed?

Mr. Lewis. Yes, sin.

Senator Sutherland. And it is on the statute books now?

Mr. Lewis. It is on the statute books now.

Senator Sutherland. You also introduced a bill in the House of Representatives a year or two ago, did you not?

Mr. Lewis. Yes, sir.

Senator Sutherland. Two years ago, prior to the creation of this commission?

Mr. Lewis. No, sir; about a year ago. It was modeled on the Civic Federation bill.

Senator Sutherland. So that for many years you have been giving this subject practical study?

Mr. Lewis. Yes, sir.

Senator Sutherland. What do you say as to the bill which has now been prepared by the commission?

Mr. Lewis. I think I have some of the pride of authorship myself in connection with one of the measures of this kind. Indeed, one is pending in the Maryland Legislature, in which both principles are applied, the English principle and the German principle, applied to the large and small employer, respectively.

I call particular attention to this:

I wish to say in regard to this measure that I was actually surprised at the excellence of its provisions, and especially with the liberality of the scale of compensation. I regard it as the best of its kind that has ever been prepared.

Senator SUTHERLAND. Is it true-

Speaking of the provisions of this bill-that they employ a more liberal scale of compensation than any law you are familiar with in the world?

Mr. Lewis. They do, sir.
Senator Sutherlander. And are more liberal than any that have been proposed or enacted by the various States in the Union?

Mr. Lewis. I think, perhaps without being prepared to prove it at this moment, that the estimate of this commission that this act will cost the railways only 50 per cent—

That should be 25 per cent, however-more than they are now paying in damages is a very grave mistake. In my judgment, it will cost the railroads $50,000,000 a year within 10 years. The number of accidents will be cumulative for at least 10 years and possibly 15 years, when they will reach their maximum number, just as a pension roll docs.

Further on he says:

I found in England that there was a reduction in the number of deaths on the railways of about 32 or 33 per cent.

That was following the adoption of the English compensation act-a reduction of the number of deaths on those railroads of from 32 to 33 per cent.

But England would not be even a fair example of the probable benefi-cence of the Institution here, because English railway accidents were already at what might be called the normal point. Ours are four times what they ought to be. I believe that the influence of this legislation through penalizing the accidents and putting a premium on greater care will be to reduce our ratio at least one-half.

And so I could go on, Mr. President, quoting from various other witnesses and persons who appeared before the commission, all of them indorsing this bill in the highest possible

Now, I may say that, so far as I am informed, employees in only three of the States of the Union have made any serious objection to this bill. Those three States are Georgia, North Carolina, and Texas. Prior to the hearing before the House committee, of which I have already spoken, at which members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary were also present, or the Senate Committee on the Judiciary were also present, word came that some of the employees from Georgia and North Carolina desired to be heard. A time was fixed, a week or such a matter in advance, and these employees were notified that they would be heard. Some of them came before the committee, but, instead of presenting any objections to the bill, they simply asked that the consideration of it be postponed until the next session of Congress, saying that they had not had an opportunity of thoroughly studying and understanding its provisions; but, so far as I know, there has not appeared, either before the commission or before either the committee of the House or of the Senate, a single railroad employee, although every opportunity was extended to them, with the exception of Mr. Carter, who has objected to the provisions of this bill.

I have called attention to the statement made by Mr. Lewis reference to the necessity for this bill passing. This is not in reference to the necessity for this bill passing. a new subject. It is a subject which has engaged the attention of the civilized world for the past 25 years. The United States has lagged behind every other country in the world in this important and necessary reform, but during the last two or three or four years the people of the United States have been taking hold of it in earnest. There have been no less than 10 commissions at work in the various States of the Union. The State of California, which is in part so ably represented by the Senator who honors me with his attention [Mr. Works], after thorough consideration, has passed a workmen's compensation act, an admirable law. The State of Wisconsin, after thorough consideration, has passed such a law, as have the States of New Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Washington, Ohio, Minnesota, Illinois, and others. It is only a question of time until the education of the people of this country will have progressed to the point where the employers' liability laws will have been abandoned and in place of them in every State in the Union there will be workmen's compensation laws.

Now, to delay action means that hundreds and thousands of widows and more than that number of children must, so long as this bill is not enacted into law, go without any compensation whatever.

Mr. Lee, supplementing what I have already read from Mr. Lewis, at page 74 of the hearings of the House committee, says this about it:

this about it:

Mr. Lee. I will just briefly go over it if you care to hear these points. I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, to hear the objections. I had understood there were objections to this bill and that gentlemen were coming here to oppose certain features of it. I have not heard any objections, but a request to postpone action, and I want to confirm the statement made by the Representative from Maryland, and that is to the effect that hundreds and hundreds of our men are being killed and crippled every month, railway employees of various classes, and every moment that you postpone action you are leaving the sleeveless fellow and the fellow with crutches without a dollar and you are leaving the widows and orphans that I believe that law should provide for without a penny.

The CHAIRMAN. Leaving them with only a lawsuit.

Mr. Lee. Leaving them, in the majority of instances, without a lawsuit, because within the past 48 hours a man came into my office with a leg off, to whom we paid $1,350, the amount of our insurance, at the time of his injury. I asked him what his company gave him. He said, "Nothing." I said. "Have you a suit pending?" He said, "No." I said. "Why?" He said, "My attorneys told me the company was not at fault; that I did not have the evidence against them." So that they did not even pay him his hospital expenses or hospital fees or anything of the kind. Under this bill I believe that our men would be provided for.

And summing up what he had to say with reference to this

And summing up what he had to say with reference to this bill, Mr. Lee made use of this language:

bill, Mr. Lee made use of this language:

In behalf of my organization I trust that your committee will see fit to report the bill to your respective assemblies as it has come to you from the compensation commission. I subscribe to the language of the commission in submitting its report to the President, that while this proposed law is not, perhaps, the most perfect measure which could be devised, nor the last word which can be said upon the subject, it is the result of careful investigation and the best thought of the commission and constitutes a step in the direction of a just, reasonable, and practicable solution of the problem with which it deals. I regard it as desirable constructive legislation, to take the place of destructive litigation, and again express the hope that it may be reported by your committee to both Houses of the Congress and that it may pass at this session.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that legislation ought to be passed upon any subject unless there is real need of it. I think one of the unfortunate tendencies in this country to-day is overlegislation. We are passing legislation upon every imaginable subject. We are passing legislation upon subjects that ought to be left alone. But where there is a real evil to be remedied, then there is no excuse for Congress, if it has jurisdiction of the subject, or for the State legislatures, if they have jurisdiction of the subject, to remain inactive.

There is a real evil to be remedied here. We have outgrown the system of employers' liability under the common law. It has no longer application to our industrial conditions. Let me briefly call attention to what the common law was. At common law no employee was permitted to recover unless he could show that his employer had been in some way at fault; unless the employer had been guilty of a want of care, in other words.

Superadded to that requirement there grew up from time to time provisions announced by the judges in deciding these l cases, which gave to the employer certain defenses. There was the defense of the assumption of risk under which, whenever it could be shown that the employee had entered the employment or remained in the employment with a knowledge of the conditions with which he was surrounded, although the master might have been negligent in not having a safe place or providing safe appliances, the employee had assumed the risk and he was denied the right of recovery.

Another defense was that of contributory negligence, that although the employer himself was guilty of negligence, if it could be shown that the employee was also guilty of negligence, he was denied the right of recovery, no matter how slight his contributory negligence may have been.

Then there was the third doctrine—the fellow-servant rule. If the injury was due to the fault of a fellow servant, the servant injured was not entitled to recover. The result was, as time went on and as our industries became more complicated, these various defenses bore on the employee with greater and greater hardship.

There was some reason at common law under the conditions that prevailed then for these particular doctrines. Under those conditions the relationship of master and servant was an exceedingly simple one. The master had few men in his employment-a half dozen or a dozen or in that neighborhood. The muster was brought into direct contact with his servants, directly supervising their work. The servants were brought into direct contact with one another, so that this direct contact enabled them mutually to guard against injury due to the want of care on the part of any of them.

Not only was the relationship itself simple, but all the surrounding conditions were simple. The appliances with which the work was done were in the main manual tools, which, as the term implies, were a mere extension of the hand. A man used a hammer, an awl, or some other simple manual appli-ance, and under those conditions that I have described whenever a man was injured it was ordinarily and usually due to somebody's want of care, because under those comparatively simple conditions if the servant pursued his work in a normal way he could not be hurt. Everything was so simple, there was no machinery, that unless some negligence intervened there could ordinarily be no injury.

Under those conditions negligence being in a great majority of the cases the controlling circumstance, there was some wisdom in providing that that should be the circumstance which should determine the right of recovery. But now under modern conditions all of that has changed. The relationship of master and servant is no longer a simple one. Particularly is that so in the railroad service. A single railroad in this country-the great New York Central lines-employs over a hundred thousand men; the Pennsylvania system more than that number. These men are not only not brought into contact with their employer, but they are not brought into contact with one another. They do not know one another. The master has been twice removed. First he has been removed by the interposition of supervising agents. He does not direct the work himself. He has agents who do it. Then he is again removed by the modern corporation, so that the real owners of the property, the real employers, simply hold stock in the corporation, which has its employees and its supervising agents. Under these conditions there is little reason for the continuance of the fellow-servant rule.

Again, we have changed the simple appliances and simple tools that were used at the time this doctrine originated for machinery—not only complicated machinery, but machinery driven at great and sometimes dangerous speed by the great and dangerous forces of steam and electricity. The machinery is very often kept in motion by a fellow servant at a remote distance from the servant who is carrying on the work. So under these conditions the reason for the existence of these common-law rules, as it seems to me, has practically disap-

Under the conditions prevailing to-day instead of the majority of accidents that happen being due to somebody's negligence, the majority of accidents that happen to-day in modern industry are due to the risks of the industry. More than onehalf of all the accidents that happen in this country to men engaged in work upon machinery is the result of the risk of that industry and that will continue. Therefore, the time has come to do away with this doctrine of the common law which puts negligence at the basis of the right of recovery and to substitute for it the fact of injury. The fact of an injury happening in the industry itself should entitle, under those conditions, every employee to compensation.

Now, I have said that the greater part of these injuries were due in one way or another to the inherent risk of the industry, and no matter what may be done in the way of providing safety devices or passing rules for the government of railway corporations, no matter how much our laws or the voluntary acts of the railroad companies may accomplish in the way of reducing the aggregate of accidents, still the proportion which is due to the risks of the industry will remain fairly constant, because we now deal with a great body of men, seventeen hundred thousand in number, and the happenings in that industry are governed by the law of averages and not by the doctrine of chance.

A single happening may be the result of chance, but when you increase those happenings to a sufficiently large number you find they are governed by the law of averages and that will remain fairly constant no matter what the changes in conditions may be.

Let me illustrate that: You may go to the post office in Washington and deposit to-day a letter with a stamp upon it and not addressed. So far as that single happening is concerned it is the result of chance. It might have happened otherwise; but if you will take all the letters that have been deposited in the post office at Washington during the year you will find that a certain definite proportion of them have been so deposited with the stamp attached and without any address. The aggregate number of letters may increase or it may decrease, but the proportion of letters unaddressed out of all this vast number of cases will remain substantially the same. That doctrine lies at the basis of all our statistics. Statistics would be of no use to us unless the law to which I have called attention, the law of averages, had uniform application.

Now, the point I make about that is that, no matter how many laws we may pass to minimize the evils of this existing system, so long as we leave negligence on the part of the employer as the controlling basis, just so long there will be a definite proportion and a very large proportion of these employees who can not recover; because under this law of averages that number of men from year to year, no matter how you may reduce the aggregate number of accidents, will have accidents happen to them as the result of the inherent risk of their dangerous employment; and so long as you leave negligence in the law just so long will a large proportion of men be killed and their helpless dependents remain without a remedy.

Let me call attention to some statistics on this question.

Mr. Boyd, who is at the head of the Ohio commission, and who has given many years of study to this question, in a statement before the committee of the House had this to say:

ment before the committee of the House had this to say:

The United States employers' liability act, which practically did the same thing and introduced a new doctrine, the doctrine of comparative negligence as between the employer and the employees, so that the historical evolution of the problem itself shows that the common-law remedy is a failure; you can not adjust the matter by modifying the common-law defenses or taking away the common-law defenses.

Now, I shall proceed to show you what the economic facts are upon which every law, the decision of every court and every statutory law, uitimately is based—upon the correction of some economic inequality, or supposed economic inequality, resting in the minds of the legislature or of the court. In two or three minutes I will simply state the results of these economic inequality, which are set forth fully in the Michigan Law Review for this month by the speaker. Prior to the adoption of the German insurance acts the experience in Germany was that only I injured workman in 10, or 10 per cent of all injured workmen, would recover compensation under a common-law action. Now, the investigations of New York State, of Ohlo, of Illinois, and the Russell Sage commission, and the Allegheny committee of Pittsburgh, Pa., show the following results:

In New York State, on an average, a workman during the last 8 or 10 years recovered in something like 12 per cent of the cases. That is, where there were 414,000 accidents reported to the liability insurance companies, something or other was paid in 52,000 of them, or about one case in eight.

companies, someth

This is not the result of speculation; it is the result of a deliberate and thoroughgoing investigation by the commission of New York.

In Ohio, in the settlement of 65,800 cases in Cuyahoga County in a period of about eight years, something was paid in less than 6 per cent of the cases, and in Illinois something was paid in 8 per cent of

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend a mement. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of allens in the United States. Mr. PERCY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Again, speaking of the German experience:

Now, if you take the economic operation of the German insurance acts, which in 1887 had 4,000,000 employees under them and to-day have 27,000,000 workmen and their dependents insured against the loss of wages arising out of industrial accidents, you can attribute on the average only 18 per cent of the cases to the negligence of the employer and about $28\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the accidents to the negligence of the employees, while in 44 per cent of the accidents the causes are due to the natural, inevitable risks of the business and 10 per cent to the combined negligence of the employer and the employer.

Here are statistics which were gathered by the German Government for three separate years—for the year 1887, the year 1897, and the year 1907. Thus they represent the experience of Germany over these several 10-year periods, and, mind you, this investigation was carried on by a thoroughly trained body of men. They are the result of the statistics gathered in cases aggregating hundreds of thousands throughout the German Empire.

In 1887 the result of those German statistics shows that the percentage of accidents which were due to negligence of the employer was 20.47; due to the negligence of the employee, 26.56; due to the negligence of both parties, 8.01; due to inevitable risks of the industries and other causes, 44.96.

That was the experience for 1887. In 1897 there was due to negligence of the employer 17.30 per cent; of the employee, 29.74 per cent; of both parties, 10.14 per cent; and due to inevitable risks of the industries, 42.82 per cent.

In 1907, 10 years later, the number due to the fault of the employer was 16.81 per cent; to that of the employee, 28.89 per cent; to both parties, 9.94 per cent; due to inevitable risks of the industries, 44.36 per cent.

The significance of those figures consists in this, that although 20 years elapsed from the time the first figures were gathered until the third set of figures were gathered, and the number of men employed had increased marvelously, and in the meantime the accidents due to negligence of the employers by the adoption of better methods had decreased, the inevitable risk of the industry remained constant or practically constant; that is, in 1887 it was 44 and a fraction per cent; in 1897, 42 and a fraction per cent; and in 1907, 44 and a fraction per cent again.

In 1887 negligence of the employer brought about 20.47 per cent of the accidents. In 1897 it had decreased to 17.30 per cent and in 1907 to 16.81 per cent.

There can be no more striking evidence of the value of the compensation law than those figures. A compensation law appeals to the self-interest of the employer. It says to him, reals to the self-interest of the employer. It says to him, "Whenever you can cut down the number of accidente, just to that extent you will save your treasury." And so, his self-interest being appealed to, he adopts every method of preventing accidents. As I said, while the number of accidents resulting from inevitable risks had remained substantially the same, the employer had reduced those due to his negligence from 20 per cent to 16 per cent in that 20-year period.

cent to 16 per cent in that 20-year period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I had called attention to the statistics gathered by the German officials on this subject; and next I direct attention to the statistics which were gathered by the labor bureau of the State of Wisconsin covering the same They investigated, altogether, 318 cases of personal injury. They found that out of those cases 11.35 per cent were due to negligence of the employer; 23.53 per cent were due wholly to the negligence of the workmen; 7.14 per cent were due to the combined fault of both; 5.88 per cent were due to the fault of fellow servants; while 52.10 per cent were due to the hazard of the industry.

I call attention to that for the purpose of showing how near our own experience has been to that of Germany. The German experience shows, on the average, about 44 per cent due to the hazard of the industry, while in Wisconsin the number shown is about 52 per cent.

Mr. Boyd, in summing up this subject and quoting all these figures, makes this deduction:

That no matter how careful the employer is or how careful the employee may be, or how high the efficiency of the State may rise in the application of ways and means in the prevention of accidents, the natural hazard remains practically constant. That on the average of from 52 per cent to 53 per cent of the cause of all accidents are due to the natural hazard of the business.

And again :

Here in this problem there is the one element alone of 52 per cent of all cases of injury for which the common law does not presume to furnish any relief at all—none for the injured workman and none for the dependents who, in most of such cases, must be supported by the community in which they live.

And again:

The effect on dependents is just the same, whether the cause of the injury was due to the negligence of the employee, to that of the employer, or to the natural hazard of the business. The common law in theory denies the injured workmen relief in all of these cases, to wit, 28.39 per cent, and, further, there is no cause of action at all in the 53.41 per cent of the cases due to the natural hazard. Or in the combination of the two elements, natural hazard and negligence of the workmen—that is, 81.80 per cent of the cases of injury the common law does not presume to furnish any compensation either to the workman or his dependents.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is out of the condition just expressed by the Senator that most of my difficulty has grown in considering what ought to be done in this matter. A majority of the cases seem to be without the fault of anyone; they are the result of natural conditions beyond control, and I have thought whether or not we would find the best remedy in a charge in the nature of a license for entering into a business that was more than 50 per cent hazardous to those who are engaged in it, and allow that to constitute the fund out of which to compensate them.

I have been groping for years with this question, having for many years of my life been called upon to deal with it professionally, and I have not yet been able to satisfy my mind that we have reached exactly the right solution. But the nearest that I have found that seems to meet the conditions is to charge people who engage in a business that is more than 50 per cent hazardous to create a fund in the nature of a license, or whatever you may call it, out of which those injured shall be compensated.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the final conclusion of the committee here as to whether they are going to go beyond the rule of evidence or not, and I will ask the Senator whether or not this measure really goes beyond the establishment of a rule of evidence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; Mr. President, it goes entirely beyond that. As I explained before the Senator came into the Chamber, the theory upon which this legislation proceeds is that under modern industrial conditions where we are dealing with as great and dangerous a force as steam or electricity, with rapidly moving machinery where vast numbers of men are employed, and with all the circumstances which the Senator well understands surround modern industry, a certain definite proportion of all accidents which happen, whether they may be increased or decreased in the aggregate by the efforts of the employer, are due to the hazards of the industry. In other words, we may reduce the number of accidents in the aggregate and decrease those due to the employers' fault, but we do not materially decrease this proportion. All the statistics have indicated very clearly that this definite proportion of accidents due to the hazards of the industry remains constant, and it is an indication that in the past we have been proceeding upon wrong lines.

As I have already said, at common law, or when the commonlaw rules originated, under the simple conditions which prevailed then, when an accident happened it was generally due to somebody's negligence, because if the man pursued his simple work under normal conditions he was not hurt. But with machinery and with the hazards that we have to-day no matter how careful we may be a certain number are inevitable. To give one illustration as to how that operates to-day, when men are working with machinery after a few years' experience their work becomes more or less automatic. Here is a man, for instance, employed in a factory. He has before him a machine, the power which operates it coming from some central station, either electricity or steam, and this power is turned off or turned on by a foot treadle. The employee puts his foot on the treadle, and as long as he retains his foot there the machinery is in motion. When he takes his foot off, the machinery stops. Now, he is busy with his hands at the same time feeding material into this machine. When he first begins his work as a novice, every act is a conscious act; his brain directs every act; it directs his foot to go upon the treadle; it directs his hands to be busy about the work that he is feeding into the machine; but as time goes on his whole work becomes automatic, and when the direction is given by the brain for these motions the direction is for the whole series of motions, not for the single act, and it becomes automatic, just as playing upon a piano after awhile becomes automatic.

Now, then, some circumstance intrudes from the outside, something occurs to disarrange the work. Impulsively the operative reaches forward to readjust the disarranged work, but the brain has given the direction for the whole series of motions, and his impulsive motion reaching forward to correct his work crosses the series of motions that he was performing and confuses the results. In other words, he fails to take his foot off the treadle and keeps the machinery in motion, and his hands go into the machinery and he is maimed.

Now, looking at that situation in cool blood, upon a full review of the whole situation, the average man is apt to say, "Why did not that man take his foot off the treadle? He ought to have known that it was dangerous to undertake to rearrange that work while the machinery was in motion. Why did he not stop it; it could have been done with a simple motion."

But the truth about it was that the man could not help himself. He could no more take his foot off the treadle under those circumstances than the machinery could stop without his taking his foot off. Now, we call that contributory negligence. It is not. This work had simply become automatic in its character and the accident was one of the hazards of the industry.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire if the Senator has investigated as to whether or not there is more danger to the overexperienced man than there is to the novice? Is it not true that a larger proportion of accidents occur to men who are overconfident than to those who are on the alert?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is quite correct about that. The statistics, I think, will show that there is a larger proportion of accidents of that character happening to men who have had long experience than to the novice, because when the novice is working every motion is directed and he watches everything with greater care. A man who does his work automatically, as he does after many years of experience, is not watching for these intruding circumstances.

Now, let me come back to the point I was discussing when the Senator from Idaho interrupted me. It will be seen from the statistics (and I could quote much more to the same effect if I had the time) that more than one-half, on the average, of all these accidents are due to the natural hazard. So long as we leave the employers' liability law in force with the element of negligence at the basis of it, half of those accidents must go unrecompensed. The suffering of the man who loses his leg as a result of the inherent risk of the industry, or as the result of his own negligence, is just as great as that of the man who loses it as the result of the negligence of his employer. The hardship upon the widow and the children of the man killed as the result of the hazards of the industry or as the result of his own negligence is just as great as though it was due to the negligence of the employer.

We must take care that these people do not become wrecks, human driftwood in society. That is one object of this legislation. The law of negligence is hard; it is unjust, it is cruel in its operation. The law of compensation proceeds upon broad humanitarian principles. It says that when a man has been injured in an industry he is a soldier in that industry, and the industry must take care of him to some extent.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator uses the expression "we must take care of these people." I assume he means that the employer must be compelled to provide for them. Of course there is no governmental application of the term.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no; society in the last analysis must take care of these people, because if the injured man or the family that is left is not compensated by the industry directly, they become a charge upon society. They must be taken care of in our charitable institutions and in one way and another; they must support themselves very often by unaccustomed and poorly paid work. This is often the case with widows, as I will show a little later on. The investigations in Ohio have shown that out of a certain number of men killed and leaving widows, a very large proportion of them, although living in fairly comfortable circumstances before the breadwinner was killed, have been compelled to go to the washtub, resorting to hard, unaccustomed work, at comparatively small compensation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the Senator-he doubtless has-taken into consideration the effect upon the expense of the business itself? To what extent would the Senator carry this question of compensation as compared with the ability of the employer to meet the liability?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This bill proceeds upon the theory that we pay half wages, and I will explain a little later along the details of it

Mr. CRAWFORD.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.
Mr. CRAWFORD. My only regret is that I have not been able to hear the Senator from Utah all the way through, and may not be able to hear his full argument: May I inquire, does the Senator deal with this phase of it, that these employees enter into the question of efficiency; that in one sense their rela-tion to industry is a relation that goes toward keeping up in the highest state of efficiency the operating industry, as a locomotive that has been damaged must be kept up in an efficient condition of repair; that these men are, in a way, devoting their lives to the work of railroading; that they are unfit for anything else; that all their training is blended with that operation; and that they are in one sense a part of the plant itself and entitled to consideration upon that theory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. The Senator from South Dakota very well states it. These men, in a sense, may be regarded as the human part of the machinery which they operate. a piece of machinery is broken, when a boiler is destroyed, the industry must replace it; it bears the expense of it. When the man who operates the machine is injured, the industry must take care of him and must repair that damage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to ask a question to see if I clearly understand the proposition. The first proposition is that compensation for all injuries is substituted for liability or the right to bring a suit for those injuries for which under the law the employer is responsible. That is the first proposition-compensation for all injuries received in the course of the employment, and the liability which formerly attached to certain cases, is entirely removed; second, that the compensation becomes a part of the operating expenses of the railways or common carriers, and, as such, is to be borne by the public through the rates charged by the railway companies, precisely as any other expense to which the company may be subjected. Is not that the general character of the bill?

The Senator from Iowa states it Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. very accurately. That is the idea of it. It must be so in the nature of things.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will bear with me a moment. It must be so, because when capital is invested in a railroad enterprise, for example, it must be permitted to have a rate which will afford compensation for the work it does. you reach into the treasury of the railroad company for any expense, for making better roadways, for compensating for these injuries, or for any other purpose, it becomes a part of the operating expenses of the railroad. They charge to their operating expenses now the amount they pay out in personal injury cases and the damages which they pay. So, in the last analysis, it is, of course, shifted to the public.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that brings us to the necessary consideration of reasonable profits. We are doing much talking and attempting to do some legislating—we have not accomplished much yet—based upon the idea of controlling tariff rates; and as a basis for that legislation we are proposing to determine what is and what is not a reasonable profit

Now, take a catastrophe such as that which line, with a curred in a great international transportation line, with a curred in a great international transportation line, with a not anticipate that-a fact for which we should all be very devoutly thankful. It is the same with a great railroad wreck, where the loss of a train of cars and an engine alone in the destruction of property would amount to perhaps 50 per cent of what would be a reasonable profit. If we are going to deal thus liberally with the injured, we must take into consideration to some extent the earnings of a railroad, and we can not crimp it right down to a percentage upon its capital, and then make it subject to these extraordinary expenses. We shall have to take that into consideration somewhat. I merely mention this because it is inseparable from the consideration of this ques-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a little later along I expect to say how much this compensation law will increase the expenses of the railroad. It is not an extravagant amount, but will increase them to some extent.

Mr. President, now I come to another branch of the subject, which is the question of how much compensation should be allowed in these cases. As I view it, there are two fundamental principles to be considered: First, the compensation must be made high enough so that it is adequate; so that it will afford a fair living for the injured man and for his family. Upon the other hand, it must not be so high as to constitute an invitation to the employee to remain idle, because the world has need of all its workers, and whenever you pay a man when not employed as much in the form of compensation in periodical payments as he could earn if at work, you invite that man to remain idle, you deprive society of his services, and you compel society to bear the burden in addition to losing his services.

The general principle, therefore, in this bill upon which compensation is based, I may illustrate in this way: A man who goes to work in one of these dangerous employments and the employer who invests his money may be regarded as joint adventurers in an industry in which a certain number of accidents are inevitable. When an accident occurs, we propose to compel the man who has invested his capital for the sake of the profits he may make to continue to pay the injured man half wages, notwithstanding the fact that he gets no services from the man; but the workman himself was a joint adventurer in the enterprise; he has invested his work in that dangerous enterprise for the sake of the wages. So we have him lose half his wages while he is doing nothing, and we compel the employer to contribute half of the wages without getting anything in return.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I put a question to the Senator? The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose you compel the employer to continue paying the injured person half wages, are you going to compel him to remain in business so that he may be able to do it, or may he, after a great disaster in which such liability has been incurred by him, quit the business in order to avoid it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That will not happen in the railroad service.

Mr. HEYBURN. It might not; but I knew it to happen in a stage line running through the Senator's State, where the parties, after suffering a judgment for $75,000, discontinued the business—an interstate-commerce transaction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the States come to deal with small employers, they will have to adopt some other scheme, just as the State of Washington has adopted a different scheme. In the State of Washington they have an insurance scheme, which, I understand, operates very well there, and probably will operate there, because they are dealing with a multiplicity of small employers; but when you come to deal with the railroads, each of them is employing such a vast number of men that it can carry its own risks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Some of them are not. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes; practically all of them are. The reason that the small employer takes insurance is that the insurance company represents so many cases that the shock of any disaster is distributed among a large number of people; but in the case of the railroads there is no need of the distribution. Their business is so large and the number of men employed is so many that, upon the average, their expenses for this purpose will remain constantly about the same. So, in other words, they carry their own insurance. There is no need of bothering with that in connection with the railroads.

What will this compensation amount to in the way of increasing the expenses of the railroad companies? We find that, roughly speaking, the railroads of the entire country during the last three years have been paying out on the average for personal-injury damages a sum amounting to $10,085,000. That has been about the average annual expense to the railroad companies. Under the operation of this proposed law, if we consider the same number of accidents, but all to be compensated under this bill, the amount which they will pay out will be approximately $15,000,000 per annum; but, inasmuch as that is distributed over a series of years in the form of periodical of these deferred payments. They pay, in the case of the widow, for example, for eight years, and they therefore have the use of the deferred payments for the intervening time between the day they begin and the day they end the compensation. So, that being worth something, the cost to the railroad would be about $13,000,000, allowing 5 per cent upon the deferred payments.

Mr. REED. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. So that the additional cost to the railroads under this compensation bill will be about 25 per cent; in other words, for every dollar they now pay out they will, under this proposed law, pay out a dollar and a quarter. Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.
Mr. REED. The Senator from Utah stated that for the last three years the railroads have paid out approximately $10,085,000 annually. Has the Senator made any calculation as to what they will pay out now that the act of Congress of 1908 as amended by the act of 1910 is sustained by the courts as in full

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the figures which I have been giving include amounts paid under the operation of that law. Let me remind the Senator from Missouri that the employers' liability law was first passed in 1906. Prior to 1908 it had been declared unconstitutional on a single ground, namely, that by its terms it applied to people engaged in intrastate commerce as well as interstate commerce. In 1908 the law was amended by Congress so as to obviate that constitutional objection, and since 1908 there has not been the slightest doubt as to the validity of that law. The Supreme Court repeatedly said that the legislation with that one element omitted was con-Therefore, since 1908 the employers' liability law has been enforced, and every case that could be brought under it has been brought. The statistics which we have gathered cover the years 1908, 1909, and 1910; so that this $10,085,000 per annum that is paid out is paid out under the operation of the employers' liability law.
Mr. REED. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. REED. I take it that the Senator, when he used the term "employer's liability law." refers to the acts of 1908 and 1910, which simply wiped out the old common-law defense?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. But not an employer's liability law in the sense that this bill is intended to be, this being liability in each case. Mr. SUTHERLAND. This differs from that.

Mr. REED. Yes; this is entirely different from the law we have been operating under.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, very different.

Mr. REED. Now, does the Senator contend that there has been no doubt about the validity of the acts of 1908 and 1910 since their passage?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do assert so, and have not the slightest doubt about it. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the employer's liability law of 1906 was valid and constitutional save for one element, and that was the element to which I have called attention. They therefore held that with that element eliminated the law was constitutional, and they repeated that over and over again in subsequent decisions,

Mr. REED. Were not the acts of 1908 and 1910 solemnly challenged in court after court, and was that question not settled finally on the 15th day of January last?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps; but there never was the slightest doubt as to what the result would be in the Supreme

Mr. REED. Perhaps not, in the mind of the Senator. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, not in the minds of most people in the country; and if the Senator would take the trouble to go to the various court records of the country I think he would be astonished to find how frequently the employer's liability laws have been resorted to during the past three years.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.
Mr. CULBERSON. Merely as a matter of information I will ask the Senator if the railroad companies themselves did not challenge the validity of the acts of 1908 and 1910?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes.
Mr. CULBERSON. And finally take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Mr. CULBERSON. That court deciding it constitutional, as

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is quite correct.
Mr. CULBERSON. The opposite parties to the controversy therefore believed that the law was unconstitutional.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the railroad companies took the companies had very little expectation of the Supreme Court overruling its former decision, because the validity of the employer's liability law of 1908 was definitely established by the decision of the Supreme Court in 1907.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. My recollection is that the last case that went to the Supreme Court involved the amendatory act of 1910, allowing suitors to go into State courts, and that that was the principal question decided.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was one question.

Mr. NELSON. That was one question; but, as the Senator says, in the decision under the act of 1906 the Supreme Court held the act valid, except only in the respect that it included local traffic in connection with interstate traffic.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, so that it may all appear together, I think the RECORD will show that the decision of the 15th of January last was a decision embracing three separate cases, and in each separate case the law had been challenged upon a different ground, or its jurisdiction over particular subjects matter had been called in question. So that at that time it was contended by the railway companies that the law was unconstitutional: it was contended that it did not apply in certain cases: and it was challenged on a still further ground which for the moment escapes me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; but, Mr. President, cases were constantly being brought since 1908 after the amended law was passed in absolute reliance upon the former decision of the Supreme Court that the law was constitutional.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did any lower court decide it was not? Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; no lower court intimated that there was any doubt about it after the decision of the Supreme

Mr. REED. Just one further question: Is it not a fact, I ask the Senator, that of the cases brought under the law passed in 1908 as finally amended in 1910 in the ordinary course of litigation, probably not more than 40 or 50 per cent of them, would have been decided and gone to final judgment before the present time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, a great many of them would not, but a great many of them did.

Mr. REED. I think it would be safe to say that 40 per cent of them had not—that is a mere estimate—judging from the ordinary delays of litigation.

Mr. SUTHERIAND. A great many of them are delayed, there is no doubt about that; but independently of all that, if we assume that under the employer's liability law more men will recover than recovered under the common law, still, as I have shown, and I think very clearly, at least one-half of the injured men and one-half of the widows and children of the deceased men will be unable to recover anything, even under that liberal law, because the injury was due to the inherent risk of the industry. You must add to that all cases where the injury is due to the sole negligence of the employee, for where it is due to the sole negligence of the employee of course he can not recover. It is only in cases of contributory negli-rence that we adopted the salesme of comparing the paglicular gence that we adopted the scheme of comparing the negligence of the two.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I only ask for information; I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, and he recognizes that fact; but I desire to ask what is the basis for his statement that, under the law as it now exists, 50 per cent of the persons injured can not recover? How does he arrive at that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Missouri did not do me the honor to remain in the Chamber while I was discussing that subject. I went over it at very great length and called attention to the German statistics and the statistics of our own country upon that subject.

Mr. REED. I was attending a committee meeting, and was absent for that reason. If I had known the Senator was speaking, I would have left the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is very kind of the Senator, and I appreciate the compliment implied.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.
Mr. CULBERSON. While the Senator is discussing the genquestion to the Supreme Court, but I think even the railroad eral run of these laws, I should like to get some information from him upon a subject to which I think he has not yet referred. This bill provides that under certain circumstances every common carrier by railroad in the District of Columbia (hereinafter designated "employer") shall pay compensation in the amounts hereinafter specified to any employee who sustains personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and resulting in his disability.

I want to emphasize, and therefore I will read the portion to which I particularly refer:

To any employee who sustains personal injury by accident arising it of and in the course of his employment and resulting in his disability.

Now the act of 1908 provides that common carriersshall be liable in damages-to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce.

To whom?

What I want to know of the Senator is, if the bill under consideration does not to a degree restrict liability beyond the act of 1908?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President, it does not restrict it, but, on the contrary, extends it. The Senator has left out one very important element in the employers' liability law, and that is, that in addition to happening in the course of that employment; that is, while engaged in interstate commerce, the accident must be due to the negligence of the employer. no recovery can be had unless the employer was negligent. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is true-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, how can the employer be held guilty of negligence for an injury that does not arise out of and does not occur in the course of the employment? The employer owes the employee no duty except in connection with his emplayment. We have broadened it by taking out of the law the element of negligence and leaving the other elements in it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have received a letter from a workingman, a railroad employee in Texas, dated April 1, in which he refers to the subject, and if it is not too much of an interruption to the Senator I shall read one paragraph of his letter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to proceed with my argument.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; I will submit it in my own time, then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was proceeding with the question of the amount of compensation and had discussed the question of half wages. The difficulty with our friends upon the other side of the Chamber who are opposing this legislation is that they are looking at the exceptional case of a large verdict and paying absolutely no attention to the entire aggregate of cases. This is a bill dealing with the whole body of employees; it is not based upon the exceptional case; it is based upon the average of the amounts which are recovered, and not upon the exceptional case. Of course, when a man sustains an injury due to the negligence of his employer, and is able to sustain that before a jury, he sometimes recovers a very large verdict; but this bill is not to be tested by that exceptional result, because, while one man may recover a large verdict by being able to prove negligence, many men are unable to recover anything at all because they can not prove negligence.

Another difficulty, it seems to me, that our friends fall into is that they argue as though we were dealing with an existing case—that is, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who spoke yesterday, referred to the inadequacy of compensating a man who has lost a foot by paying him $2,400, as though we had that typical man before us, as though the man had already lost his foot, and we were considering the question of compensating that man. But that is not the case. The case we are considering is that of the man who has not yet been injured. We are not dealing with past transactions. Now, take that man. Here is a brakeman who is earning $100 a month in the employment of a railroad. It is inevitable, we will suppose, that that brakeman during the next year is going to lose his foot. Suppose we knew that and suppose he knew it. But while it is inevitable that he will lose his foot, it is altogether uncertain whether he will lose it under such circumstances that he could prove negligence and recover a large verdict, or whether it would be under such circumstances that he could not prove negligence and therefore would not recover a single cent. Suppose we say to that man, "Mr. Brakeman, within the next year you are going to lose your foot. The chances are at least equal"—they predominate really, but we will say that they are equal-"that your foot will be lost under such circumstances that you can recover nothing. On the other hand, the circumstances may be suchand they are equal-that you can recover a verdict for $5,000, but if you recover a verdict of $5,000 you must out of that $5,000 compensate a lawyer, who will take your case upon a contingent fee by retaining an average of at least 40 per cent of what you recover." That is the average amount paid in the United States-40 per cent in contingent fees. They run as high as 50 per cent.

Personal-injury lawyers who are engaged in this business in the United States are so full of the milk of human kindness that they will take this unfortunate individual who has lost his foot or lost his arm and carry on his case for him and give him 60 per cent of the amount they recover. But we say to this man: "You may have an equal chance of recovering the $5,000, but you must immediately pay to your lawyer $2,000. which will reduce the actual recovery to $3,000. In addition to that you will have other expenses. In addition to that, you may have to wait 15 months or 2 years or 3 years or even 4 years before your case is determined at all. In the meantime, you will be living a life of anxiety and uncertainty. Even though you are able to go to work, your employer will not employ you. employers in the same business will not employ you. You must for three years perhaps be an object of charity, and at the end of two years or three years or four years, as the case may be, you will receive out of this $5,000, perhaps, $2,500."

We say to this man: "We propose by this law, no matter what the circumstances are, to guarantee you $2,400." Is there any doubt about what that man would say if you put that case to him-a case bound to happen in the future? is the case we put to these people who are going to become widows or orphans or half orphans in the future.

There are 4,000 men killed every year in the railroad service. The widows of a few of them recover good judgments. majority of them recover little or nothing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Many of them are nonsuited.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Now, let me give the Senate the benefit of some figures. is all very well to speculate about this, but the statistics show us what has happened. This law deals with substantially 1,700,000 employees. Four thousand of those employees are to 80,000 are injured more or less seriously every year. Out of the men who were injured during the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, 200 lost both feet; 18 lost both hands; 14 of them were rendered totally blind; 54 of them lost one foot and one hand; 272 were totally disabled for life by other injuries; 962 lost one hand; 1,786 lost one foot; 780 one eye; 1,756 lost other parts of the body.

Now, I have already said that to these men who are thus injured, and to the widows and families of those killed, approximately $10,085,000 is paid out each year under the present law. Under the proposed law approximately $15,000,000 would be paid.

Now, let us see whether or not these people will be better compensated under this law than under the existing liability law. The number of deaths that the computation is based upon is 5,672, covering reports from the railways of the country, representing about 57 per cent of the employees. Out of the 5,672 cases of death the average amount paid to dependents was $1,221. Under this law where the widow with a child or children is left the amount can not fall below $2,400 nor exceed $4,800. So that the minimum amount allowed by this law to all cases, simply by showing that the death has occurred in the course of the employment, is double the average amount paid under the existing liability law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Townsend in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask, with respect to the amount of twelve hundred and odd dollars which the Senator read, whether that is arrived at by dividing the total number of persons killed by the total amount or is it arrived at by taking into consideration only those who recover?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That takes into consideration all the cases.

Mr. REED. All the cases?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All the cases; that is, all the cases that would be compensated under this law.

In other words, let me explain. There would be 5,672 cases that would be compensated under this law and the minimum amount which would be paid would be $2,400; the maximum $4,800. Those same persons under the existing law receive an average of $1,221.

That arises from the fact that so many cases Mr. REED. were defeated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. REED. Or compromised for in unconscionable amounts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; precisely.

Mr. REED. And that allows the railroad company all of the defenses which it is now able to make at law, and most of those cases arise under laws which permit a great many defenses which can not now be made. Is not that true?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has a pretty large margin

The difference between $1,221 average, and an avereven then. age under this law of $3,000, allows a pretty wide margin.

The average paid under the present law in cases of permanent total disability is $4,238. That is where the man is rendered totally and permanently unable to do anything in the Under this law we take the average length of life, allowing, in making the comparison, for the fact that the man was injured, and he will receive an average of about $8,000 as against $4,238 because his payments continue for life. If he lives 20 years his payment continues.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I do wish to get the figures clear in my own mind. How do you figure the mortality there-on the ordinary insurance basis?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. I have already said that we deduct from the ordinary insurance mortality tables-I have forgotten the exact amount. I had this computation made by a person who is skilled, and that is the result of it.

Mr. REED. Are there any mortality tables compiled anywhere, by which you can determine the length of time a man will live after he has been permanently injured in this way?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know of any published tables.

Mr. REED. Is it not mere guesswork, then?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it is not guesswork, because the man who made the estimate for me is a man skilled as an actuary, and he took into consideration the elements. I give it to the Senate for what it is worth. Anyway there is not the slightest doubt that a man so injured will receive far more under this law than he would under the liability law.

Take the cases of permanent partial injuries, and with reference to those we have the exact figures. There were 450 cases where the employee lost one hand. The average amount paid in those cases was $1,649. Under this law the smallest amount paid would be $1,800 and the maximum $3,600. So it will be seen again that the minimum amount paid under the proposed law exceeds the average amount paid under the employers' liability law.

For the loss of a leg—862 cases—the average amount paid under the employers' liability law was $1,566; under this law the least would be $1,650, the highest $3,300. Again, the minimum exceeds the average paid under the present law.

Take the loss of a foot, 48 months. That has been complained of here a good deal. Our figures do not show the amount paid now, because we have no exact returns in that case; but under the proposed law he will receive from $1,200 to $2,400, which, we know, will exceed the average now paid, though we do not know exactly how much.

Take the case of the loss of one eye. Three hundred and eighty cases; average amount paid under existing law was $628; under the proposed law, as he gets compensation for 30 months, it will be from $750 to $1,500; again the minimum exceeding the average under the old law.

For temporary injuries, a less serious class of injuries, 160,000 employees were considered during the last three years; the average amount paid them was $73. Under the existing system, as I have already said, of course only about 50 per cent of the amount paid reaches the employees, so that this $1,221 paid in case of death and these other amounts to which called attention must be still further reduced by subtracting from them the amount paid in expenses-for lawyers' fees and other expenses-and when you come to deduct that, you will find that each employee will receive two or three times as much under the compensation law as under the employers' liability law. That is shown from the fact, as I have already stated, that of the $10,085,000 paid only about one-half, or about $5,000,000, reaches the pockets of the employees. Onehalf of it is dissipated, is wasted in the process of going from the treasury of the company to the pockets of the employees.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Utah contend that under this act men will not have to pay attorney's fees; that they will not have to litigate their cases, just the same as they do under the present law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do so contend, Mr. President, without the slightest hesitation.

Mr. REED. Your law provides for a trial before an adjuster, does it not?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. And then it provides for an appeal by either party to the Federal court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And then it provides for a trial in the Federal court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the parties want it.

Mr. REED. They are likely to want it unless they agree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so. Here is a law which fixes a definite amount to be paid in case of an injury. eliminates the questions of fact that we have under the employers' liability law. The only questions that can arise in any of these cases are, first, was the man employed? Second, was the employer engaged in interstate commerce? Third, was the employee injured in the course of his employment? Fourth, what was the extent of his injuries? If he lost a limb, if he sustained any of these specified injuries, at once the compensation is automatically paid.

Let me call the Senator's attention to what the experience has been under the English law.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, just a word. Does the Senator contend that one-fiftieth out of all the actual injuries suffered are specified and the amount fixed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The greater part of the serious injuries have been specified.

Mr. REED. You fix the compensation for injury to a hand if it is taken off, to a foot if it is taken off, to a leg if it is taken off, and the value of an eye and the loss of hearing; but does the Senator contend that that embraces or covers the field of injuries that men receive in railroad accidents?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would have anticipated all the Senator has asked me if he had let me go on.

In the administration of the English law, which is a compensation law upon which, in some measure, this law is based and which contains many elements of uncertainty that have been eliminated in this law, the experience is that an average of 90 per cent of the cases of accident are compensated for automatically and less than 10 per cent of them are litigated in any form whatever.

I remember reading the testimony of one employer of labor who said that they paid from 90 to 95 per cent of all accident cases at once automatically; and under our law, as I say, we have eliminated many of these elements of uncertainty which have resulted in litigation in England. I venture to predict with absolute confidence that at least 95 per cent of the injuries which will occur after this law shall have been adopted will be adjusted automatically between the employers and the employees, leaving not to exceed 5 per cent to be litigated in any form whatsoever.

Now, let me go on. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I should like to get through with this one branch of the argument.

Mr. REED. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not object to the Senator interrupting me, but I should like to finish this particular phase of the case.

I have called attention to these aggregate figures and have said that for every dollar which the railroad companies now pay they will, under this law, pay $1.25; but it must be borne in mind that the employees only receive about one-half of the amount now paid by the employers, namely, out of the ten million and odd dollars the employees get about $5,000,000. Under this law there would be $15,000,000 a year. I venture to predict with absolute confidence that it will not cost to exceed a half million dollars to distribute that fund, leaving $14,500,000 to go directly to the employees; and, as to that, I think I have exaggerated the expense rather than understated it. If I am correct about that, for every dollar the railroad companies now expend for this purpose they will pay $1.25, but for every dollar the railroad employees now receive they will, under this proposed law, receive pretty well up to $3. Those are figures which it seems to me can not be gainsaid; and a law that will distribute to the mass of the injured employees of this country and their dependent widows and children and other dependents nearly $3 for every one they now receive, it seems to me, is far in advance of the existing condition of affairs.

Now, let me call attention to the experience of some of the States with reference to this matter. Here is a recent report from the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission of Michigan, which shows that the average of all compensation and relief in fatal accidents was $388.53.

The commission says:

This investigation developed the fact that the damages for injuries similar in effect and extent were widely variant in amount and were on the average less than the compensation proposed under suggested compensation acts. It appeared also that great delay generally occurred between the time of the accident and the final settlement of the action and that the actual costs of the litigation, exclusive of attorneys' fees, was a considerable item.

Now, here are cases that went into court, covering the Wayne County Circuit Court, of 22 men partially disabled for life. These are picked cases, and they involve no payments in more than 54 per cent of the cases. Out of those cases 12 of them recovered nothing; one of them recovered $200, one of them $350, one of them $400, one of them $1,250, two of them $2,500, one of them $4,000, two of them $5,000, one of them $5,750.

It must be borne in mind that those were cases brought in court and as the result of litigation, and nothing should be asked more than that the cases should be submitted to a jury, and in cases in which verdicts were returned they were all submitted to a jury, and yet in all of those cases, where the man was partially disabled for life, the average amount recovered was $884.09, and of the 22 cases 541 per cent recovered nothing.

Now here is another series of cases in the Wayne County circuit court, 23 men temporarily totally disabled; average amount recovered, $400; and of the 23, 47.8 per cent recovered nothing. These are cases actually brought in court. Here is another series in the Wayne Circuit Court of 16 minors partially disabled for life; average recovery, $812, and of the above 16 cases 43.7 per cent recovered nothing. How much larger the percentage would be if we included cases where suit was not brought can be readily imagined.

Again, here is the statement of the commission based upon another table of figures:

mother fable of figures:

The cases in Table XXIV consumed a total of 28 days of the court's time, at a cost to the State and country of $2,774.31. The court cost to the parties at suit was $027.60. While there were 32 cases in which suit was commenced, only 12 of them proceeded to trial, the rest being discontinued, either because of settlement or some other cause resulting in failure to prosecute. The average attorney fee for the above cases was $757.33; added to this cost to the worker (exclusive of his permanent loss of earning power) was an average medical expenditure of $111.33, and a loss of wages averaging $180.60, thus showing that while the average amount recovered by the injured in court amounted to $2,542.78, there was left for the injured but $1,338.55, when final settlement was made, and, it will be noted, three of these accidents resulted in death.

Take the effect upon the public. This commission carried on an investigation into the social condition of these injured employees and of their families who were left dependent, and they found:

found:

To demonstrate the truth of this statement an investigation was attempted of the records of the poor commission of Detroit and the coroner's office of Wayne County. The information there secured indicates clearly that the families of injured workmen are a substantial charge upon the public funds. The coroner's office shows a record of 91 fatal accidents in 1910 arising from all causes, but an investigation was completed in only 12 industrial accidents, which were selected at random.

The inquiry as to the records of the poor commission developed statistics as to 14 fatal accidents, 13 partial permanent disabilities, and 20 temporary disabilities.

The examination of the data above referred to and the evidence of the extraordinary waste in litigation confirmed the commission in its opinion that the expense of the present system to the State is so great that it could with justice bear the expense of the administration of any remedial statute.

Then follows a statement of the condition of the family after the death had occurred. Here are typical cases:

Mother earns money washing clothes; one son works irregularly.

Another:

Home broken up; widow living with married daughter.

Another:

Receiving aid from poor commission; destitute.

Another:

Widow; no means of support except washing clothes.

Widow running small store; debts used up insurance money.

Another:

Receiving aid from poor commission; live in two rooms.

Another:

Widow now at housework; sickly and destitute; oldest boy in hos-

There is case after case of that kind. They had the same experience in Ohio. Let me call attention to that. Here was the investigation of the Ohio commission:

An individual investigation to determine the social and economic conditions of families deprived by industry of their breadwinners was made in 86 cases. The results, as compiled in Table No. 5, show that nearly 56 per cent of the widows were compelled to go to work, and at an average weekly wage of $5.51. Altogether in these homes there were 178 children, about 70 per cent of whom were under 12; 59 per cent of the others were forced to go to work. The wretched condition in which some of these families were found can not be depicted by means of tables.

Fifty-six per cent of the widows visited and 18 per cent of the children were forced to go to work to earn a livelihood as a result of the industrial accidents.

Fifty-six per cent of these widows working at an average of $5.51 a week, and yet Senators stand up here and insist that this law is not an improvement over the employers' liability

Mr. REED. Are the figures which the Senator has just given applicable to railway employees?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think they are. They include railroad employees.

Mr. REED. Are they limited to railroad employees?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; they are not limited.
Mr. REED. Of course, they cover a field—
Mr. SUTHERLAND. They would apply unless the widow was left in comfortable circumstances. If a widow is left with nothing as the result of the death of her husband she would be just as badly off if she were the wife of a railroad conductor.

Mr. REED. But what I wish to inquire is why quote figures as to a class of people who never have had any substantial remedy and put them in argument in a case where the survivors of railroad injuries have had a cause of action, unless the injury resulted solely from the negligence of the man employed or from inevitable and unavoidable accident?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Ohio has a pretty liberal law upon the subject of employers' liability. I think the Senator from Ohio will bear me out in that. It is about as liberal a law as there is anywhere in the country, almost as liberal as the Federal employers' liability law.

I call attention to these figures gathered from various States because they bear out the figures submitted by this commission, and they all tell the same story.

I have submitted the figures that our commission has gathered with reference to railroad employees, and we have shown that the average amount received by widows and children of employees killed by accident upon the railroads is only $1,221 year and of that the lawyer receives 40 per cent. Mr. John Mitchell, who is a very strong advocate of this kind of legislation, tells a story which very well illustrates it. said that a workman in Chicago engaged on a high building sustained an injury by falling off the building, due to some defect. He was taken to the hospital, but before he reached the hospital one of these humanitarian lawyers was upon his track, and before he was comfortably settled in the hospital others appeared contesting for his case. Finally he gave his case to one of them. A few weeks after, not yet being out of the hospital, the lawyer appeared and said to the man, "I have settled your case; I have got $1,500 for it"; and he presented to the injured employee a check for $500 and a receipt for $1,000 for his compensation and expenses. The employee looked a little disappointed. The lawyer said to him, "Do you not think I made a pretty good settlement?" He replied, "Yes; you did make a fairly good settlement, but I was just wondering which one of us it was who fell off that building." [Laughter.]

Under the proposed law the first thing that will happen will be the elimination of this waste that I have called attention to. In addition to that, I think justice will be promoted. The man who is injured without negligence needs help. The man who is injured by his own negligence needs help, and he will get it under this law. It will tend, further, to relieve society from a great burden which it now bears in the way of direct charity, and the resultant expenses will be shifted to the people engaged in transportation. It will result in better relations between employee and employer. Everybody understands now that when a man is injured in the railroad service at once a condition of antagonism results between the two, and it will To my mind one of the strong arguments in favor of result. the law is that it will result in our being able to find out how these accidents occur, and, finding how they occur, to apply the remedy. The situation is, when an accident occurs under existing law, that the employee is bent upon establishing the negligence of his employer, and so the tendency upon his part is to distort and exaggerate the facts which tend to prove negligence. Upon the other side, the employer is bent upon disproving his own negligence, and therefore he distorts and exaggerates the facts in order to disprove negligence upon his own part. Out of that double distortion we do not get the facts as to how these accidents occur.

Now, under this law, where the compensation must be paid automatically, wholly independent of the negligence of the employer, there is no temptation to try to distort the facts. The employer is told under all circumstances, no matter how this accident occurs, you must pay a certain definite compensa-tion, and the employee is told, however this accident occurs, you must receive certain definite compensation; and so the temptation is taken from both of them to mislead with reference to the way in which these accidents occur. Now, when we can get the actual facts, as we will be able to do in that way, as to how these railroad accidents occur, then we will be able to apply the remedy, and to some extent cut them down.

You have exactly the same sort of situation in dealing with accidents that you have in dealing with the subject of health. For example, you have an epidemic of typhoid fever somewhere. A medical board is at work investigating it, and they differ, and the general public differ, as to whether the epidemic is and the general public differ, as to whether the epidemic is caused by flies, or by the water supply, or by the milk supply. They are not able to apply the remedy. But if they can ascertain by getting the truth that it is due to the water supply they can apply the remedy and stop the epidemic. It is just so with these accidents. When we take away from both the employer and the employee all incentive to misrepresent the facts and obtain the truth we will be able to apply the remedies.

I intend at another time to take up the question of the constitutionality of this proposed law, but I will not stop to discuss

Mr. POMERENE.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I have noticed upon reading the bill that it distinguishes between the amount which shall be paid to the dependents who may be nonresidents of the country. In other words, the dependents of a resident will receive under the provisions of the bill a larger amount than the dependents will receive if they are nonresidents. It seems to me that the bill in that respect is subject to criticism, and for this reason: It occurs to me that when the relation of the employer and the employee is established, that of itself ought to fix the amount which the employees' dependents should receive, irrespective of the fact as to whether they are residents of the country or nonresidents.

Further, this occurs to me as a reason why there should be no distinction. If it should become known, as the fact would be in the event that the bill becomes a law, that the foreign dependents of an employee are to receive less than the dependents of a resident, there would be a temptation on the part of the employer to take into his employment those who had nonresident families dependent upon them. I should like to hear the Senator's reasons for drawing the bill as it has been drawn

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, there were several reasons. In the first place, I may say that I think the fear which the Senator expresses that it would tend to encourage the employment of foreigners as opposed to American citizens is without foundation. Under the employers' liability law, if the Senator would go over the statistics, he would find that the families residing in foreign countries of employees who are killed recover far less on the average than the dependents living in this country recover. That may be due to a variety of circumstances. It may be due to the fact that they are not here to appeal to the sympathies of the jury, and because they must accept settle-ments, and so on. This law will not disturb that. The widow and children in a foreign country will still receive one year's The commission put the question directly to the railroad employees, who were very much interested in the subject, and they thought, according to their observation, a discrimination against residents would not result.

Another reason is that it is exceedingly difficult with col-lateral heirs to discover just who they are in foreign countries. Whenever a man dies all sorts of claims are set up. A man will turn up who has 24 or 25 brothers occasionally. So there is great difficulty in distributing the amount, which is to be paid periodically. They must be searched out and receipts must be obtained from them. There will be great difficulty in getting the amount into the hands of all these foreign dependents.

But, in addition to that, this is a law the expense of which must be met by American society. The burden must be borne in the last analysis by our own people. In other words, one great object of the law is to take care of these dependents, to take care of these injured employees, to prevent them from becoming a wreckage upon society, and to take care of them because they are our people. We are going quite far enough if we take care of our own, without extending it to the dependents in foreign lands, who must look to their own people and to their own government to care for them.

But we have, notwithstanding that, provided in the case of a widow and children for the payment of a year's wages, which would be the equivalent of between one-fourth and one-third of the amount paid to our own people; and that is worth more in any of the foreign countries than the same amount would be worth here.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. ROOT. May I not ask the Senator from Utah if it is not also true that the scale of compensation in foreign countries whose laws have been examined by the commission is very much lower than the scale of compensation fixed in this proposed law? Co, if the scale which is paid to citizens of the United States under this law were applied to persons resident abroad, we would be giving to the citizens of other countries a much higher scale of compensation than those countries would give to our people if they went there and were employed. In other words, is it not true that the diminished scale for alien nonresidents conforms both to the diminished necessities of life abroad and to the diminished scale of compensation which is allowed

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is quite correct about that. The amount paid abroad is far less than the amount provided by this proposed law.

Mr. POMERENE. To what countries does the Senator refer? SUTHERLAND. Every country abroad. I have gone over the law of every European country. Not only that, but I have gone over the laws, and I have them here, of all the English-speaking countries of the English colonies, where the conditions more nearly approach ours. Take, for example, Queensland. The provision of that law is for death, "a sum equal to three years' earnings, but not less than £200 ($973.30) nor more than £400 ($1,946.60)." That is far in excess of the general amount allowed in European countries, and yet we allow between twenty-four and forty-eight hundred dollars. Their maximum is only $1,946.60.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERIAND. Yes. Mr. POMERENE. I was going to ask the Senator whether he could state what are the provisions of the law of Austria-

Hungary, and also of the German Empire.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is difficult in a sentence to explain the difference. In the law of the German Empire there is a provision for the payment, I think, of 65 per cent; but that is limited by the aggregate amount. The percentage based upon that does not come up to our compensation. In addition to all that, under the German law for the first 13 weeks of disability no accident compensation is received. That falls upon the sickness fund, the greater proportion of which is contributed by the employees; and by taking out the first 13 weeks, which, as the Senator will see, is three months, perhaps two-thirds of the whole amount of the compensation is taken care of in that way, because the number of comparatively trivial accidents is very great compared with the number of serious accidents; and in that way it falls below ours.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a moment ago, in answer to the question which I put, the Senator stated that it was the opinion of some of the gentlemen who had appeared before the commission that the mere fact that there was a discrimination between the amount which would be paid to foreign dependents and the amount which would be paid to the resident dependents would not affect the question of employment. Are there any statistics available touching this point or is that view based on mere opinion?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was the opinion of the railroad employees, who are the people most vitally concerned in this legislation, of course.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, it is evident that we have had no Federal legislation of that kind, and therefore I do not see upon what they could base an intelligent opinion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I said to the Senator that under the existing law the amount recovered by foreign dependents bears pretty much the same relation to the amount recovered by the resident defendants that the compensation allowed to foreign dependents bears to that paid to resident defendants under this proposed law. Still, according to the opinion of those railroad men, that had not resulted in a discrimination.

Now, the Senator asks for Austria-Hungary. Here is Hungary. They allow-pensions to heirs not exceeding 60 per cent of annual earnings of de-ceased, as follows-

Then they particularize. Widows, 20 per cent, and so on, Now, note the amount that It is to be computed on:
